Never since the vetoes of the McNary-Haugen bills by Presidents Coolidge and Hoover has a Chief Executive of the United States dealt such a damaging blow to the well-being of American farmers.

Mr. President, the parity idea originated in the 1920's, in the bitter struggle of depressed agriculture for the McNary-Haugen plan. This plan—which was sponsored by two great Republican leaders who will rank throughout history as outstanding champions of the farmers—proposed that the Government should help the farmers to achieve prices which are fair. The concept of parity maintained that farmers should be able to purchase, with a given quantity of farm commodities, the same amount of nonfarm commodities that they had been able to buy before World War I, before the severe economic dislocations caused by the war had brought farmers' purchasing power into serious imbalance.

Since that time—nearly 40 years ago—friends of the farmers have fought to uphold the principle that Congress should seek to help farmers to achieve the goal of parity of purchasing power. The parity ratio is a standard used to measure the degree to which farm prices are in line with what Congress has defined as a fair and equitable objective for farmers.

Farmers are keenly interested in parity, because parity prices measure the level at which prices farmers receive for commodities will be in balance with the prices they must pay for goods and services—nonfarm commodities, for interest on their borrowings, for taxes, and for farm labor.

Parity prices necessarily change from time to time, in the same direction and in the same amount as the prices which farmers must pay for what they buy. If prices farmers pay double, parity prices double; if prices farmers pay go down, then parity prices go down too.

Parity prices do not necessarily assure the farmer of a profit. Neither do they assure the farmers of incomes equal to those of nonfarm people. In fact, farmers' incomes are substantially below those of others in our economy, even when farm prices have averaged full parity.

Nor is farming the only occupation in which a balance or equality between prices received and paid is constantly measured and sought—often with assistance and encouragement from the Government. Every regulated public utility in the Nation is assured of parity—at a much higher level than parity for farmers. Utilities are assured of income sufficient to cover their operating costs, however high they might go—and in addition to that, of a fair rate of profit.

Surely, if the utility companies which provide our electricity and telephones and transportation are entitled to parity—plus a profit—then the farmers who furnish us with the finest diets ever enjoyed by any nation on the face of the earth should be entitled to parity.

The Fair Labor Standards Act guarantees workers $1 an hour. This incidentally, is nearly twice what Department of Agriculture figures show our Wisconsin farmers are earning. Our Wisconsin farmers are earning on the average, 55 cents an hour, if you grant them a modest 5 percent return on their invested capital. This is according to the Department of Agriculture.

No one else in our economy, Mr. President, would be willing to settle for as low a measurement of fair and equitable returns as farm parity represents. Farm parity should be modified upward, toward full, true equality of opportunity for farm people, instead of being reversed toward the dismal patterns of the 1920's and 1930's, as the President now seeks to do.

When farm prices last averaged 100 percent of parity, in 1952, the average incomes of people on farms averaged only 52 percent of the average for nonfarm people. The average last year was only 45 percent—although 600,000 farms have disappeared since that time, and the farm families who lived on them have moved into the cities.

Mr. President, I do not know of any action by a Chief Executive of the United States which more clearly repudiates specific, solemn promises which he has made to American farmers, than this proposal by President Eisenhower to scuttle the parity principle.

In his 1952 campaign, General Eisenhower promised farmers he would seek "not merely 90 percent of parity—but full parity." Yet in 1958, he proposes to bury the very yardstick he upheld to measure his pledge to farmers 6 years ago.

In his 1956 campaign, the President promised to help farmers to achieve full income parity. Today, just 6 years later, he is asking Congress to acquiesce in an action which will drive farm prices down and will reduce farmers' incomes sharply below the present level, which is less than one-half of what he promised.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. I wish to ask a question. As to the allegation that the President in his 1952 campaign spoke of "100 percent of parity in the marketplace," is it not true that that is generally conceded to have been his honest statement of his desire that they be paid that much in the marketplace?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is entirely true, and that statement was made in Kasson, Minn. A little later—on October 14, 1952, I believe—at Brookings, S. Dak., General Eisenhower said the Republican Party was pledged to 90 percent of parity—not in the marketplace, but to the achievement of 90 percent of parity, guaranteed—and I stress the word "guaranteed"—by our Federal Government.

Mr. KUCHEL. I cannot qualify as an expert on farm legislation, and certainly the statements the Senator from Wisconsin has made should be discussed with respect to farm legislation.

However, I wish to say, as I have stated, that there are two sides to this question; and some of the able Members of the majority party take a position quite opposed to that taken by my friend from Wisconsin. For example, the able junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], a Democrat, and a distinguished former Secretary of Agriculture, I believe agrees with the President in his farm recommendations, rather than with those which are so ably advanced by my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from California for that observation; and I would remind him that on his side of the aisle there are a number of Senators, some of whom are true experts on agriculture, and are Members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, who would strongly support my position and would vehemently disagree with Secretary Benson and President Eisenhower. Of course, that indicates one of the fine things about the two parties and why they are parties of such substance—namely, they are great enough to permit disagreements within themselves.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin several questions, since he represents a great party, and since in his statement he has discussed the stand taken by the other party. Am I correctly informed that 30 percent of American agriculture operates under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and that 70 percent operates outside that law?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am not sure of the exact figures, but the Senator from Arizona makes a legitimate point. The fact is that the commodities which are supported are very likely a minority of the production of our farmers.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Am I also correct in understanding that the 70 percent who depend upon the action taken in the open market have enjoyed—I will not say good times—but the same corresponding level that the rest of the economy of the country and the rest of the businesses of the country have had? In other words, they have had their ups and their downs; but actually they have made money at the small farmer level, have they not?

Mr. PROXMIRE. As the distinguished Senator from Arizona knows, the prices of various farm commodities are very closely related. For example, as he knows, the price of corn is directly related to the price of hogs and the price of beef. This interrelationship means that when prices for corn are supported, the price for hogs is favorably influenced, too. So that much of the production that is outside the price support area is very immediately, directly, and favorably affected by adequate price supports.

I should like to say that I would be the last to defend the present farm program of parity as it is presently on the statute books. I think it is an unsound program. It is ridiculous; it is not giving the farmer what he needs; and certainly it constitutes a very great burden which the taxpayers of the Nation must bear. I think it must go. But I think to abandon the farmer and to leave him with no program at all would be grievously irresponsible of us and devastating for our farmers.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will yield further, let me say that Arizona is something of a farming State; about 20 percent of our income comes from farming. We in the West find it difficult to understand why peanuts, for example, are so vital a crop to the Nation that the taxpayers' money should be spent to support peanuts. We do not understand, honestly, why tobacco should be supported. We believe the action of the corn farmers last year was a wise one. We, who grow and sell cotton at a price well below the supported figure, are rather frightened because the market is disappearing below the pegged price. Do not those situations give the Senator from Wisconsin some cause for worry?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Indeed, they do; they give me a great deal of worry, and a feeling that we should have a consistent farm program which will deal with virtually all, if not all, of our farm production, and will deal with it equitably. I believe the present farm program does not deal properly and equitably with agriculture. It should deal with all, or virtually all, not just 30 percent, as the Senator from Arizona has pointed out.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I believe the Senator from Wisconsin will offer at the proper time what he believes to be a proper farm program, in place of what he says is the unworkable program today—a program which the administration inherited. But does the Senator from Wisconsin believe that the 70 percent of agriculture who today are not under the farm program are getting along all right without having the Government stick its nose into their businesses?

Mr. PROXMIRE. My answer is that at the last session I introduced an omnibus farm bill which would bring all of agriculture into the program; and I asked a number of agricultural authorities—including the distinguished junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] and the outstanding expert in the Library of Congress—for their estimates regarding the cost of my program. All of them assured me that it would be substantially less than the cost of the present program. I want that point clearly understood, because my criticism today, which is a criticism of the present program, rather than an offer of a new program, is consistent with the fact that I have offered an alternative program in the past, and I intend to do so again in the future.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I respect the Senator from Wisconsin for that fact; I have always understood him to be one who does not criticize an existing program without offering something in its place.

But certainly it should be clear that the present administration, which inherited the present bad agricultural program from its predecessors, has, unfortunately, had to place the burden around the necks of the American people to the extent of billions and billions of dollars.

I think the Senator will have to agree, on sober reflection, that much of the increased cost of equipment and supplies of American agriculture comes from increased taxes. We find tax costs going up all over the country, not just in agriculture. Taxes and unwarranted wage increases are probably the greatest source of cost increase to the American farmer.

I hope the Senator, in his recommendations, will give due consideration to that fact, because I think the farmers will be thankful.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Arizona for his helpful and constructive suggestions. I would add that one cost increase to the American farmer comes about as a direct result of action by the Federal Government—it is interest rates. The farmer is overwhelmingly a debtor. The policy of the Federal Reserve Board, in increasing interest costs, has increased the farmer's costs very substantially.

Another element contributing to increased costs is the kind of administered price economy in which we live, as has been brought out so well by the Kefauver hearings. That kind of economy adversely affects the farmer.

Also, to be fair, if labor unions are successful in securing wage increases which exceed productive increases, the farmer is hurt along with everybody else in the economy.

I think we should recognize the fact that we cannot expect the farmer to survive by himself in a free economy of the Ricardian or Adam Smith type, because there exist in our economy administered prices, limited production of steel and oil, for instance. Also there are interest rates which Government policy allows to go higher and higher. In that kind of economy we must recognize the farmer must be helped, rather than be cut loose and allowed to sink.

Mr. President, the Congress of the United States must not be a party to this brutal injustice to farm people. Instead of chopping down the parity yardstick of equity for farm people, we should erect another one beside it, to measure the parity of income as the real goal of national farm policy.

Instead of pointing agriculture back toward the tragedy of the Great Depression, we should point toward a future in which farmers and their wives and their children can enjoy full equality of opportunity with other citizens, in an expanding economy that provides constantly rising standards of living for all.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, if there is no objection from my friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BASKETBALL TOURNAMENT AT SANTIAGO, CHILE

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, many Americans, myself among them, felt a deep disappointment recently when a basketball team representing the United States was sadly trounced by Russia in a world amateur tournament in Santiago, Chile, and was further humiliated the next day when showered by debris from the stands in a none-too-impressive victory over the Chile team.

At a time when our prestige could be much better in some parts of the continent to our south, this is most deplorable. I know Senators will share this humiliation with me when I tell them that one Santiago newspaper stated following the rout by Russia: "When it comes to shooting at the moon or at a basket, the United States cannot keep up with Russia."

I am from Indiana, where basketball is close to being a religion, and I pride myself on the fact that I am a basketball fan. So possibly this occurrence in South America has affected me more than others. However, I cannot help being sorrowful at the manner in which the U.S. team was selected for an international competition of such importance, and the circumstances that led up to the incidents mentioned.

I suppose Americans are as good sports as any, and can accept a defeat as well as the next one. That has been proven from time to time in the past. We have lost contests in international competition and survived, very often taking the foreign victors to our hearts as heroes and idols. But generally we have been represented by our best talent, or at least by representative athletes. Here, though, is a situation that is quite different.

Basketball is an American sport, introduced by us to 80 countries of the world. We should guard that heritage zealously—I might even say, jealously. From the facts that I have been able to ascertain about this tournament in Chile, our country went into it in a most haphazard way. Where other countries sent their best, many coming from much greater distances than we, no such effort was made by this country.

I am not censuring those who selected the team. Perhaps they were handicapped, possibly by lack of funds or even of available talent. I am not criticizing the American players. I am sure they gave of their best, and their best just was not good enough. But I do feel that when we enter a worldwide event of this kind, proper preparations should be made; that a strong attempt should be made to field the best possible team.

Apparently this was not done in connection with this tournament in Chile. Many outstanding basketball players have told me they did not even know that a team was being selected to play in Santiago; others said they did know, but had not been approached and did not know how to go about trying for a place on the team.

How was the team chosen? I quote from a newspaper dispatch:

According to the Associated Press, there was no college or AAU (Amateur Athletic Union) team available to send to Chile.

So we RAN AN AD in an AIR FORCE PAPER asking for VOLUNTEERS.

The capitals are those of the newspaper I am quoting from—the Chicago Daily News of January 30, 1959.

Players desiring a tryout had to pass their request through channels and risked veto anywhere along the line by superiors.

As a result, our volunteer basketball ambassadors put on a rather embarrassing show in Chile.

We have profited in the past by setbacks and experiences in other worldly matters. We should use this last incident as a lesson for our participation in world sports in the future. International athletic competition is most important. I suggest, in the future, that leaders in any sport anticipating international competition call in qualified experts to aid, men highly experienced in the particular field, so that a team representing this country will be one that we can well be proud of, win or lose.

I ask unanimous consent that a column by Mr. Arthur Daley in the New York Times of February 3, 1959, be included as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPORTS OF THE TIMES

(By Arthur Daley)

SEEING RED

Brazil graciously saved the United States from deeper embarrassment during the world amateur basketball championships in Chile last week by outscoring our inept and maladroit heroes in their farewell game. Otherwise the North Americans would have taken the title from the Soviet Union by default. And that would have magnified our utter disgrace.

It's bad enough as it is, heaven knows. Basketball is an American invention and this country has more and better players per square foot than any nation in the globe. Yet we carelessly sent a pick-up team of fifth-rate players to a world championship tournament. The group was so lacking in talent that the Russians whomped them, 62 to 37. So American prestige plummeted still lower in the land where we are trying to impress the citizenry with our good neighbor policy.

The kids who played are not at fault, even though indignant Chilean spectators demonstrated their disgust by showering the Americans with papers, coins, fruit and other debris. The blame rests on the colleges and clubs that couldn't be bothered to make the trip and on the officials who countenanced such laissez faire. It was a disgrace.

Propaganda coup

Once upon a time the United States could slough off something like that without an eyebrow being raised. But when the Soviet Union is involved in any sports event, it ceases to be one of those jolly-well-done-old-boy affairs. The Russians don't fool. They go at it with a grim, single-mindedness of purpose, all guns loaded with live ammunition.

Four years ago the Canadians figured they could win the world amateur hockey championships from force of habit. They unthinkingly dispatched a third-rate team. The Russians won and everyone in the Dominion was as outraged as if the Soviet skaters had trampled the Maple Leaf flag into the Moscow mud. Canada beaten at Canada's own game? It was the insult supreme.

The chances are that the United States will do in basketball what Canada did the next time in hockey. The folks to the north organized a crackerjack team and slaughtered the Red brothers. We'll do that also, but for us it could almost be the old story of too little, too late.

The Russian propaganda coup is tremendous. The Communist newspaper in Santiago already has crowed: "When it comes to shooting at the moon or a basket, the United States cannot keep up with Russia." Howja like them potatoes?

Don't forget that South America—forgive me for bringing up a touchy subject—is quite conscious of the fact that the colossus to the north had to get reinforcements from a Peruvian national, Alex Olmedo, in order to win back the Davis Cup.

By default

Although sports is just an incidental part of the American way of life, the Soviet Union regards it as an integral and integrated part of the relentless surge toward world communism. Hence there was no hesitancy when the time came for the Russian quintet to face Nationalist China, a nation unrecognized by the Kremlin. The Red brothers coldly defaulted and yielded the world championship, placing it as a sacrifice at the altar of their propaganda gods.

The next thing you know the Soviet will send golfers to cut divots on the sacred sod of St. Andrews in Scotland and begin their domination of that Caledonian sport. And maybe Casey Stengel should begin to strengthen his Yankees for an onslaught there.

The most hilarious skit at the baseball writers show was one that introduced the whacky Jerry Mitchell as a commissar with Astrakhan hat, red Cossack greatcoat, and glittering Cossack boots plus a handlebar mustache. He spoke only a Sid Caesar version of Russian, which Len Koppett interpreted. A string of gutturals spewed forth under the mustache.

"Hees excellency says," droned the interpreter, "that baseball in Rooshia is on a higher plane—on steppes, ha, ha."

Not for laughs

This broad burlesque was funny and yet it's no laughing matter when the Russians engage in any sport. They use athletics as a showcase to display the rapidity of their advances. The result is impressive.

Starting from nowhere they have become a world power over the past decade in track and field, gymnastics, weightlifting, wrestling, speed skating, skiing, hockey, basketball, and anything else they decide to concentrate on. They have just started a serious study of capitalistic sport as could be found, tennis. Within the next decade they'll be battling for the Davis Cup.

The old Anglo-Saxon principle of sports for sports sake no longer is operative. The Russians bring their own warped viewpoint into the world of athletics and use the toy department as a propaganda tool.

It behooves America to become increasingly aware of this new fact of life. Only our best will do whenever we face the Soviet Union in competition. We've been sportsmen long enough to accept defeat of our best without blinking and without reproach. But the other kind of defeat, such as the recent basketball one, is inexcusable because it is unnecessarily damaging to American prestige.

HEALTH SERVICES STUDY COMMISSION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I introduce today for myself and Senators BEALL, CARLSON, CASE of New Jersey, and COOPER, a joint resolution to establish a Health Services Study Commission which would determine the health service needs of all our citizens, with particular reference to the coverage required by and actually extended to certain groups like the aged, unemployed, mentally ill, minorities, and others, including families in thinly populated areas, by the many voluntary prepaid health insurance plans now in operation.

At the end of a 2-year study, the Commission would recommend to the President and the Congress what legislation, if any, might be necessary to supplement or stimulate broader health protection coverage by existing private and nonprofit programs and to gage the effect of such an expansion on our health personnel and facilities.

Senators CASE, COOPER, and I are the minority members of the Subcommittee on Health of the Senate Labor and Publice Welfare Committee.

Since the founding of the Public Health Service in 1798, the Federal Government has recognized its responsibility toward promoting the health and welfare needs of the general public. The Service's extensive medical research activities, the establishment of social security, and Federal aid for hospital construction are examples of pioneer efforts by the Federal Government in many areas where, without such assistance, major needs could not have been met. I feel that, before undertaking important new financial responsibilities in the health field, the Federal Government should assess the job being done by voluntary health insurance plans which operate within our free enterprise system, without impinging upon the traditional doctor-patient relationship. That is one of the principal reasons why a study of available health services is urgently required to be carried out by a Federal commission which can investigate all the facets of what is obviously a national problem.

Under the terms of the bill, the Commission, to be composed of 3 public and 12 private members, shall specifically examine the following matters:

First. The adequacy of existing programs of health insurance and group or cooperative health plans in meeting the overall health service needs of the entire population;

Second. The necessity for extending such health insurance coverage to provide adequately for retired or elderly persons, those temporarily unemployed, and those suffering from mental illness;

Third. The problems experienced by the aged, members of racial, or other minority groups and residents of rural areas in securing health insurance coverage;

Fourth. The effect which expanded coverage of such plans would have upon the adequacy of the existing number and distribution of health personnel and facilities.

I wish to emphasize, in this connection, that the joint resolution which my colleagues and I are introducing proposes to use as a base the organizations already established by voluntary health plans and insurance plans which are so widespread in use in our country. It is not intended to establish a system of Government medicine or a system of Government medical care.

Indeed, this is the feasible alternative, heavily based upon the private economic system, to any idea of a system of Government medical care, such as roused so much controversy late in the 1940's when the so-called Government medical plan was proposed by the administration.

Mr. President, in recent years, there has been a sizable increase in the number who participate in voluntary health insurance plans, as these plans have come to be recognized as the soundest method for our people to meet the unpredictable and frequently high costs of medical and hospital care. However, an examination of the total number enrolled in voluntary health insurance plans leads to a misleading diagnosis. The fact that in 1957 121 million people had some sort of protection must be balanced against the harsh statistic that less than one-quarter of our total medical expenditures were covered by prepaid hospital insurance plans. When less than $4 billion of the $15 billion total was accounted for by these plans, it is symptomatic of the inadequacy of the protection held by those who have some form of coverage, to say nothing of the financial burden borne by the 50 million or more who have no health coverage of any sort.

Mr. President, I emphasize that obviously there are tremendous lags in the program, magnificent as it is and substantial as it is as a foundation upon which to build.

Another fertile field for study by the Commission is the coverage extended to various population groups like the aged. It is estimated that no more than 10 percent of the total hospital costs of retired or elderly persons are now covered. Whatever the cause may be—prohibitively high premium costs, automatic cancellation of policies after a certain age, or the refusal to issue policies to the aged by many insurance plans—a growing proportion of our population will be without adequate coverage as those 65 or older increase from 1 in 12 to 1 in 8 by the year 2000.

The recession lows of 1958 brought into sharp focus the plight of some 4 million temporarily unemployed workers who were ineligible to receive one or more unemployment compensation payments because of illness which disqualified them under existing law.

I emphasize the 4 million is not an absolute figure, but refers to 4 million workers from many millions unemployed from time to time who suffered the deprivation because of illness. This worked severe hardship on both the unemployed and their families who were cut off from such payments at the very moment when they most needed financial aid.

There are two categories, the aged and the unemployed, who especially need to have their health needs reviewed. Finally, there are complaints that racial and other minority groups are often unable to participate in existing health insurance plans. Because of their generally low income levels as many as 60 percent of these families are estimated to live in substandard housing which is both unsafe and unsanitary. Inevitably this results in a poor general health record which requires higher than average medical service expenditures and, if absorbed by existing health insurance programs, these added costs could force a substantial increase in the premium rates for all members. In addition, although over 75 percent of the population in 11 industrial States in the Northeast is covered by some form of voluntary health insurance, in the remaining 31 States the proportion with such protection is far lower and in predominantly rural areas sinks way below 50 percent.

I emphasize this point very strongly, since it is of interest to many Members of the Senate. In predominantly rural areas the coverage for any kind of health protection sinks way below 50 percent.

There is considerable evidence, though much of it incomplete, that wide gaps do exist in the kind of protection given and the groups which are covered under existing voluntary health service plans. The creation of a Federal Health Services Study Commission which is now proposed by myself and four other colleagues is an essential first step in judging first, whether legislation on the Federal level is required in this field; second, whether existing programs are meeting current needs; and, third, whether our overall responsibility in making sure adequate health protection is provided to the aged, unemployed, indigent, and others can be met satisfactorily through the growing number of private agencies. Such a national inventory of our health services must be taken promptly.

Mr. President, I emphasize that, of course, an investigation such as this could be made by a senatorial committee or by a joint committee of both Houses. It is our tradition that when we want to prepare a program with which to go forward in the country—a program which might be partly private, partly public, partly State, partly municipal, and partly Federal—the traditional way in which we approach a great national issue of this character is by a commission. Of course, the bipartisan Commission established by the bill has all the investigatory and operational powers normally granted to such bodies and is composed of 15 members to be appointed as follows: First, 7 by the President, 3 from the executive branch, and 4 from private life; second, 4 by the President of the Senate from private life; and, third, 4 by the Speaker of the House of Representatives from private life.

Our Members can always deal with these questions in the committees. I think it is very important that both the legislative and executive arms have highly skilled people of their choice available for this kind of service.

Mr. President, my friend and colleague the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] intended to make a statement supplementary to mine, since he is deeply interested in the proposed legislation, of which I have the honor to state he is a cosponsor. I should like to read his statement into the RECORD, since it is not very long. I observe my colleague the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] is waiting to address the Senate. I state to the Senator that this will take only about 2 minutes.

The statement prepared by the Senator from New Jersey is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CLIFFORD P. CASE UPON INTRODUCTION OF HEALTH SERVICES STUDY COMMISSION RESOLUTION

In recent years, Mr. President, great progress has been made in medical science. Great progress has been made, also, toward bringing medical care within the reach of the American people. Have we done as much as we can and should do in this direction?

Today, as ranking Republican on the Health Subcommittee of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, I am joining the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and other colleagues in a proposal to establish a Health Services Study Commission. Such a commission is urgently needed. Appointed by the President and Congress from professional and private life, this 15-member Commission would explore the effectiveness of current health-insurance programs and recommend ways of filling current gaps in those efforts.

It would inventory health personnel and facilities to determine whether their present number and distribution are adequate to handle expanded health insurance programs.

Mr. President, statistics in the health field are incomplete and inconclusive. Private health-insurance plans—properly the cornerstone of our system—are on the increase in coverage, allowance of benefits, and complexity.

In the United States last year, nearly 120 million of our people had some form of hospitalization insurance. For surgical care, 101 million Americans had insurance protection, at least in part. Insurance against medical care in hospitals covered 65 million. Nine million could be treated by doctors at home or in the office under insurance plans of one kind or another.

Company and union plans, community programs, group health insurance coverage like Blue Cross or Blue Shield, voluntary prepayment plans of private insurance companies offering either individual or group policies, and coverage offered by private medical associations are the chief bulwark of our private health-insurance system.

Their growth has been steady. In 1958, 72 percent of the American people were covered by some form of hospitalization insurance. Ten years earlier, 42 percent of all Americans had this, the most popular kind of protection. In 1948 24 percent carried surgical insurance compared to 65 percent today. Major medical expense policies which today protect 13 million people against the costs of catastrophic or prolonged sickness were unheard of a decade ago.

The proportion of all private medical bills paid by insurance has likewise gone up in these 10 years, from 27 percent in 1948 for hospital service, to 57 percent in 1957. Insurance paid for 6 percent of the cost of doctors bills in 1948 and 31 percent in 1957.

Despite these strides, troublesome questions arise. They require authoritative answers before we decide whether, how much, and what form of help Government should give the development of private insurance programs.

Several areas of particular need should be explored and the Commission our bill would set up can help supply the answers. The Commission will determine, for example, "the need for extended health insurance coverage for group or cooperative health programs so as to provide adequately for (a) the health service needs of retired persons and elderly persons, (b) the health service needs of persons during periods when they are temporarily unemployed; (c) the health service needs of persons who are suffering from mental illness;

"Problems experienced by elderly persons, members of racial or other minority groups, and residents of rural areas in securing health insurance coverage or in securing the benefits of group or cooperative health programs designed to enable participants therein to secure medical care."

According to the Health Information Foundation, in 1957 about three out of every eight persons 65 and more in this country had some form of voluntary health insurance. An additional one-sixth of the aged population had carried insurance previously, but the last time, on the average, they were covered was 5 years ago. Among those insured, benefits were believed to pay the entire medical bill for about one-third of the insured, and only part of the bill for the remaining two-thirds.

In each plan which permits coverage for the aged, how does the fine print read? How many policies are cancellable and under what circumstances? Can the aged meet the increased costs of coverage? Are benefits at all comparable to those for younger age groups? Many questions remain.

As Mr. Shapiro and Miss Einhorn, of the Health Information Plan of Greater New York, recently wrote: "The outstanding features of HIP's enrollment with aged subscribers is that, despite the conversion privilege, most of those who must decide whether to convert or to terminate coverage, dropped their insurance * * *. On leaving employment many of the subscribers are faced with the dual economic problem of reduced income and increased out-of-pocket costs to maintain their insurance. And this, of course, at a time when their medical needs are increasing. A pertinent question for the committee is where and how do the aged whose health insurance is terminated obtain medical care. It would be of much interest, for example, to determine the extent to which former HIP enrollees become dependent on hospital clinics and ward facilities."

Insurance for the mentally ill raises equally serious questions. Dr. Louis S. Reed, of Cornell University, found that prepayment plans generally provide less extensive coverage for mental illness than for other types. He states this is due to the long duration of mental illness, to the fact that mental illness has traditionally been considered as apart from other illness, and to the fact that much of this kind of hospitalization is provided in Government hospitals at little or no cost.

The difficulty of providing health insurance coverage for these special groups stems chiefly from the fact they require above-average amounts of care and, in general, in the case of the aging, have below-average incomes. Any large expansion of protection for the aged must involve some way of covering costs by spreading them through other segments of the population. It may not be reasonable to expect private, competitive plans to distribute social costs needed to assure adequate protection to all or the great majority of the aged.

It is in these special areas that Government assistance, within the framework of our private insurance system, may be indicated.

The Health Services Study Commission should guide us to right decisions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 43) to establish the Health Services Study Commission, introduced by Mr. JAVITS (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

STUDY BY COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS OF INTERNATIONAL ACTIVITIES OF THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 42), to authorize the Committee on Government Operations to make a study of the international activities of the Federal executive branch departments and agencies relative to worldwide health, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will proceed to state the committee amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Rules and Administration was, on page 2, line 20, after the word "from," to strike out "date of approval" and insert "February 1, 1959."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 15, after the word "exceed" to strike out "$55,000" and insert "$45,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the first point I wish to make with reference to the resolution is in connection with the amendment of the title so as to read: "Resolution authorizing the Committee on Government Operations to make a complete study of all matters pertaining to international activities of Federal executive branch departments and agencies in the field of health and medical research."

It is very important that the title be perfectly clear.

Mr. President, yesterday afternoon when the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Calendar No. 20, Senate Resolution 42, I was engaged as chairman of the Subcommittee on Disarmament of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in taking up the significant problems before that subcommittee. It was not possible for me therefore, to be present on the floor when my distinguished colleague from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] moved to take up this resolution extending for 1 year the international health study.

I should like to make a few remarks today to point out the deep significance of this study.

I should like to show why the study is so necessary as background to the work of other committees of the Senate and why it is so essential if we are to fulfill the mission of the Committee on Government Operations.

The basic point about this study is that we are endeavoring to gather facts through the study which might not, in the rush of events be gathered in so comprehensive a way by any other committee but which are essential to the understanding by the Congress of this very important overall field of international health and medical research.

OVERALL U.S. HEALTH EXPENDITURES

As amended by the Committee on Rules, Senate Resolution 42 provides for a total of $45,000 to be spent during this coming year.

If this appears to be a considerable sum, I invite the attention of my colleagues to the fact that the U.S. Government is spending for medical research no less than $454 million this year. And I say this is a very sound and fruitful expenditure on our Government's part.

I further invite the attention of my colleagues to the fact that for overall health activities, hospital care, research, and otherwise, the U.S. Government is spending a little under $3 billion a year.

THE INTERNATIONAL CHALLENGE

Now, the question may be asked, Why make a study on international research and international assistance as such?

The answer is that the great unfulfilled need of medical research today is in the field of expanded international cooperation. This is not simply my opinion—it is the opinion of science in general, of medical leaders in Bethesda and all over the land.

I repeat, the greatest single opportunity for accelerated new discovery is through strengthening the cooperation of American and foreign medical research.

Unless this is done we may find that the almost half a billion dollars which we are wisely spending in medical research—but which is being spent almost exclusively in the continental United States—may not realize its fullest potentialities.

Already, fortunately, Federal agencies are beginning to extend their research activities into the international sphere. That means that the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the National Science Foundation, and the Department of Defense are beginning to be active in overseas medical research work.

The question is, however, Will this activity proceed along the soundest and most efficient lines?

A further question concerns our international medical assistance efforts. Here, again, we have a multiplicity of instrumentalities—U.S. agencies like ICA and international agencies like the World Health Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization, the United Nations Children's Fund.

The question is, therefore, Are our overseas medical-assistance programs proceeding with fullest efficiency and coordination?

The answers can only come from a comprehensive review such as is already under way.

In my judgment, to spend $45,000 which may contribute to the efficiency of research which may indirectly affect $3 billion of U.S. health expenditures—to do so is good business and sound economics.

The $45,000 which we contemplate is, in my judgment, minimal for this task.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR HILL'S BILL

I may say further that it is a source of special gratification to me that yesterday, on the very day that the Senate was beginning to take up the continuation of this study that there was introduced in the Senate by the distinguished senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], what I regard as a genuinely historic bill which will become one of the great landmarks of the 86th Congress. I refer to Senate Joint Resolution 41, The International Health and Medical Research Act of 1959. It is similar to the bill introduced by my colleague, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare [Mr. HILL] in the previous Congress.

It is my pleasure to be one of the many cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 41, the "Health for Peace" act. Naturally, it is a source of pride to me to have been referred to in the course of the eloquent remarks of yesterday by my able associate from Alabama—who is the universally acknowledged dean of health legislation in the Senate, the tireless champion of this health cause. He was generous enough to refer to some of my background efforts in this international health field.

I can assure my thoughtful friend from Alabama that I can think of few, if any, bills to which I would be prouder to contribute in any measure than this great piece of legislation for which he deserves and will receive the highest credit which a grateful Nation can confer upon him.

The present Hill bill Senate Joint Resolution 41 is, of course, but the latest in a long series of notable Lister Hill bills which the people of Alabama and the United States of America recognize as health statesmanship of the highest order.

The Labor Committee which the senior Senator from Alabama heads is, of course, one of the busiest in the Capitol. But I look forward to the hearings which it will hold, at no doubt an early date, on this bill and which will receive, I am sure, an outpouring of favorable sentiment from the medical profession and from lay leaders throughout this country.

SPECIALIZED APPROACH OF GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS COMMITTEE

Of course, the Lister Hill bill stands in its own right. We of the Senate Committee on Government Operations are not in any way evaluating this or any other bill. That is not our business. That is instead the jurisdiction of the very competent Labor and Public Welfare Committee. Our own jurisdiction is separate and apart, as the questions and answers which follow will indicate.

What the Government Operations Subcommittee is doing is making a comprehensive analysis of the budgetary and other facts in the world health picture. We are studying medical research as conducted not simply by the great National Institute of Health. We are studying too, medical assistance, as conducted by a wide variety of U.S. Government agencies and by international agencies of which the United States is a participant.

A MEMORANDUM OF ANSWERS IN RESPONSE TO QUESTIONS FROM ALL OVER THE WORLD

Literally hundreds upon hundreds of letters have come from all parts of the United States and literally from all over the world kindly praising this international health study, offering suggestions, and making inquiries about it.

In order to be of service to our many correspondents, I have prepared a factual background memorandum. It is prepared in the form of a series of questions and answers. They describe the origin of this study, its progress to date, its scope, its initial publications, its significance, and it future plans.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks the factual background memorandum to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON SENATE RESOLUTION 42, 86TH CONGRESS, AUTHORIZING CONTINUATION OF INTERNATIONAL HEALTH STUDY

WHAT WAS THE ORIGIN OF THIS STUDY?

Senate Resolution 347, 85th Congress, approved August 18, 1958, authorized the expenditure of $30,000 by the Senate Committee on Government Operations for the purpose of an international health study.

Specifically, the resolution directed a review of "any and all matters pertaining to the international activities of Federal executive branch departments and agencies relative to worldwide health matters * * * and of any and all matters pertaining to international health, research, rehabilitation, and assistance programs."

The resolution directed a report to the Senate by January 31, 1959, in accordance with standard practice of the Senate for such reports.

WHAT IS NOW PROPOSED UNDER THE STUDY?

Senate Resolution 42, as amended by the Senate Committee on Rules, directs that (a) the duration of the review be extended until January 31, 1960; (b) $45,000 be authorized for the study.

It might be noted that the Senate Committee on Government Operations had proposed a larger figure—$55,000. Even this sum, however, would have been less, proportionately, for the full year that was granted under Senate Resolution 347, 85th Congress, for the 5½ months from August 18, 1958, to January 31, 1959.

It should be further noted that of the $30,000 originally allocated, approximately $21,000 was returned as of January 31, 1959, in unexpended balance.

WAS IT CONTEMPLATED ORIGINALLY THAT THE STUDY COULD BE COMPLETED IN 6 MONTHS?

No. Any such comprehensive review naturally requires a longer period of time.

The January 31 deadline in the new congressional session was a matter, therefore, of customary Senate procedure, rather than being intended as an actual termination date for the study.

HOW HAS THE COMMITTEE USED THE TIME THUS FAR AVAILABLE?

It has acted with all possible dispatch.

First, Chairman MCCLELLAN of the Committee on Government Operations assigned to the standing Subcommittee on Reorganization and International Organizations jurisdiction for the study.

Immediately, operations commenced for a thorough analysis:

(A) A comprehensive 9-page work plan was drafted. This plan spelled out that the study's objective was to "study the many international health programs in which the U.S. Government is directly engaged and/or which it financially supports, so as to determine (a) what is now being done, by whom, where, when, how, with what standards, at what cost, and with what objectives in mind; (b) in the event of any duplication, inefficiency, or other operational problems, what changes might be made."

The work plan indicated that "where changes appear necessary, the subcommittee intends to develop recommendations whereby the resources of the taxpayers of the United States may be used with increasing efficiency."

The work plan, incidentally, has been widely praised by literally dozens of medical authorities for its comprehensiveness and carefulness of approach.

(B) The subcommittee proceeded to invite reactions to all present international health activity by circularizing the work plan to the widest possible variety of expert groups. These groups included (a) agencies of the U.S. Government; (b) international organizations of which the United States is a member; (c) American medical organizations and allied groups—nurses, therapists, etc., in the healing arts; (d) American voluntary health organizations, sectarian and nonsectarian; (e) American and international scientific organizations in the fields of biology, chemistry, and related disciplines; (f) American businesses which have had extensive experience in overseas programs of health for their own employees; (g) the American pharmaceutical industry, including its trade associations; (h) foundations; (i) American medical colleges and schools of public health; (j) independent research laboratories; (k) leading American scientists and physicians.

(C) Literally hundreds of helpful reactions have poured in as a result. This has included detailed correspondence, often with voluminous reports attached, from all of the types of groups mentioned above. The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has been especially cooperative.

The overall correspondence contains a wealth of constructive data which it is believed has rarely, if ever, been available to the Congress for a similar purpose.

Great numbers of unsolicited communications have come in, as well, from medical leaders at home and abroad who have heard of this study.

Many Senators' offices have referred both correspondence and medical visitors to the subcommittee.

(D) The subcommittee staff has participated in a great many conferences with medical experts from both private and public life, analyzing this problem.

(E) Since the study is per se international, it was and is necessary to secure direct first-hand reports from leading authorities abroad on the subject of medical research and service.

Accordingly, the chairman of the subcommittee conferred with health and other officials in the following foreign countries from mid-November to early December 1958: France, Switzerland, Finland, Denmark, Sweden, United Kingdom, Soviet Union, and Norway.

Prior to the chairman's discussions, the project director of the study had, during a trip from mid-October to early November, conferred with officials in many of the above and in these additional countries: Italy, Belgium, and Germany.

Likewise, judgment was gained from officials in Spain by the staff director of the committee. He compiled additional information, as did the consultant to the committee from numerous European authorities at the time the chairman and project director were separately viewing this problem in Scandinavia and the Soviet Union.

The chairman personally secured information from the broadest possible gamut of officialdom, in addition to purely medical authorities.

A formal hearing was held in Paris at which testimony was received from the Director of the French National Institute of Hygiene, the Executive Secretary of the Council of International Organizations in Medical Sciences, and the Chairman of the Board of "Excerpta Medica" Foundation.

Helpful statements were compiled as well from Nobel award winners and other outstanding biologists, chemists, physicists, in many of the aforementioned countries.

DO THE SUBCOMMITTEE'S FINDINGS TO DATE INDICATE THAT THE SUBJECT MATTER OF THE STUDY WILL PROVE AS IMPORTANT AND HELPFUL AS WAS ORIGINALLY ENVISIONED?

Yes. The subcommittee has found that (1) The medical profession, at home and abroad, has literally been unanimous in all its many communications in support of the importance of the study and the need for it to proceed full speed ahead; and (2) in its own review, the subcommittee does find a host of problems of major magnitude to the legislative and executive branches which it intends to explore in detail.

DOES THE STUDY INDICATE THAT THE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS IS THE GROUP TO HANDLE THIS REVIEW?

Yes. The broad nature of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Government Operations uniquely qualifies it to make the type of comprehensive review which is essential.

In its memorandum of justification to the Committee on Rules, the Committee on Government Operations noted these facts:

(A) Rule XXV of the Senate provides that it shall be the Committee on Government Operations to which "shall be referred all proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, and other matters relating to the following subjects:

"(a) Budget and accounting measures, other than appropriations.

"(b) Reorganizations in the executive branch of the Government.

"(c) Such committee shall have the duty of (1) studying the operation of Government activities of all levels with a view to determining its economy and efficiency; (2) studying intergovernmental relationships between the United States and the States and municipalities, and between the United States and international organizations of which the United States is a member."

All of these responsibilities are brought into action in view of the vast scope of Federal health programs.

(B) No less than eight agencies of the U.S. Government are currently engaged, if only in part, in medical-biological research. These agencies include:

(1) Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

(2) Atomic Energy Commission.

(3) Veterans' Administration.

(4) Department of Defense—Army, Navy, and Air Force.

(5) Department of Agriculture.

(6) National Science Foundation.

(7) Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization.

(8) Department of Commerce.

The National Research Council—National Academy of Sciences likewise plays an important role.

(C) No less than four agencies are responsible for administering or implementing international health assistance programs:

(1) Department of State.

(2) International Cooperation Administration.

(3) Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

(4) National Science Foundation.

(D) No less than 11 international organizations in which the United States is active are involved in health activity, in whole or in substantial part:

(1) United Nations including Technical Assistance and Special Scientific Committees.

(2) World Health Organization and Pan-American Health Organization.

(3) United Nations Children's Fund.

(4) Food and Agricultural Organization.

(5) United Nations Relief and Works Agency (Arab refugees).

(6) United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization.

(7) International Labor Organization (occupational health).

(8) South Pacific Commission.

(9) International Atomic Energy Agency.

(10) International Civil Aviation Organization (e.g., health quarantine).

(11) Colombo Plan.

(E) No less than nine additional U.S. agencies have health-related functions of some significance.

(1) Department of Labor.

(2) Department of Treasury.

(3) Department of Justice.

(4) Federal Trade Commission.

(5) Civil Service Commission.

(6) President's Committee on Employment of the Physically Handicapped.

(7) Small Business Administration.

(8) Panama Canal Zone Government.

(9) National Advisory Committee to Selective Service.

The present study will naturally only examine those Federal activities bearing upon the two fields of (1) international medical research, (2) international medical assistance.

Indirect results of the findings may however, significantly affect many of the programs handled by agencies on the aforementioned lists.

The subcommittee is examining among other phases the extent to which the health and research recommendations of the Hoover Commission, an organization of the executive branch of Government, have been carried out. This is a phase entirely within the jurisdiction of this committee.

WHAT IS THE OVERALL RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE JURISDICTION OF THIS COMMITTEE AND THAT OF OTHER COMMITTEES IN THIS GENERAL FIELD?

The relationship is a vital one. Every effort has been made to demarcate areas of review, so as to minimize overlapping and avoid duplication of effort.

The committee stated at the outset that it recognized, of course, the jurisdiction of other Senate committees in the health and research fields.

Accordingly, it invited the collaboration of the following Senate committees: (a) The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, (b) the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, (c) the Senate Committee on Armed Services, (d) the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

It has kept these committees advised and has, in every way, sought to avoid any waste or duplicate motion.

The other committees have indicated that they recognize this committee's jurisdiction. They note that the Committee on Government Operations does not intend, for example, to evaluate the quality of American medical research or the substance of American foreign relations. Rather, it is such questions as procedure, coordination, budgeting, efficiency, authority which engage the attention of this committee.

WHAT IS THE IMPORTANCE FROM THE U.S. BUDGETARY STANDPOINT OF INTERNATIONAL MEDICAL RESEARCH?

Certain financial figures will provide the answer on why improved research pays financial dividends to the taxpayers.

As indicated in the memorandum of justification which was filed with the Senate Committee on Rules (see S. Rept. 22), agencies of the U.S. Government had obligational authority for all purposes related to health of no less than $2.8 billion in the 1959 fiscal year.

For all activities of the U.S. Government, obligational authority totaled $76.9 billion in the 1959 fiscal year.

According to the American Medical Association the $2.8 billion subtotal represented an increase of $344.7 million over the obligational authority of the previous year.

Of the $2.8 billion, an estimated $454 million was to be devoted directly to the field of medical research.

It is important to bear in mind that it is medical research which offers some of the brightest opportunities for helping to relieve the rising financial costs of overall health programs to the Federal Government.

It has been estimated that nearly 38 million Americans are eligible in whole or in part to receive medical care from or through the Federal Government. The amount of such care will tend to increase in years up ahead, in view, as the memorandum pointed out, of such factors as the aging of the veterans population of the United States.

How research can pay off to reduce such costs can perhaps best be seen in an illness like pneumonia. Just a few short years ago, a person stricken with pneumonia might have spent several weeks in the hospital with comparatively expensive medical, nursing, and bed care. Even then, the results might not have been entirely satisfactory. By contrast, today, so-called miracle drugs can reduce previous costs down to an almost insignificant fraction of what they might have otherwise have been and can often prove far more effective.

Of course, there is no guarantee on the results of specific research. But there is ample reason to believe that strengthened cooperation in medical research should result in increased likelihood of fruitful advances.

ARE THERE OTHER ADVANTAGES FROM A FINANCIAL STANDPOINT?

Definitely yes:

(a) American wage earners lose literally billions of dollars a year in income because of sickness and disability. But the results of past medical research demonstrate that major discoveries can result in enormous savings of income which might otherwise be lost because of absence from work.

(b) A further result of lost income is, of course, lost tax revenue to the Federal Treasury.

(c) Still another result of absence from work is the fact that the efficiency of American business is reduced, thereby serving to increase costs.

(d) It should be noted, too, that sickness and disability result in enormous direct and indirect costs to State and local governments as well.

The subcommittee points out that American medical research is fortunately proceeding in high gear. The question before the Senate is not, therefore, whether such research will continue or not; of course, the research will definitely continue. But the subcommittee is of the strong opinion that this particular study may prove one of the many means by which the efficiency of research may be strengthened at home and abroad.

WHAT OTHER VALUES ARE THERE IN THE STUDY?

Many values. It should be noted that in the questions which have been presented and answered thus far, only one of the two phases of the study has been mentioned in detail. That is the phase of international medical research.

The second phase is likewise crucial: international medical assistance. Today, such assistance involves aside from research the expenditure by the International Cooperation Administration alone of some $46 million in 34 nations.

In the case of such assistance, there is ample justification from many standpoints for the study.

(a) The primary justification is the same as in the instance of research—the humanitarian reason. The basic aim of medical research is to help find new answers to reduce pain and suffering, disability and premature death. The aim of medical assistance is precisely the same—to apply known remedies so as to help liberate man from the yoke of disease and illness. Efficiency of assistance programs is therefore essential.

(b) But if one were of such a mind as to view the problem strictly from an economic standpoint, there is a direct or indirect financial value in studying our present worldwide assistance programs. Today, American business pays what amounts to a hidden tax on raw materials which it secures from underdeveloped areas of the world because of the toll taken by sickness in those areas. In other words, goods which American importers buy are higher in price because of the lowered efficiency resulting from widespread disease in Asia, Africa, the Middle East and Latin America. In turn the American exporter incurs economic losses since foreign markets are reduced in their purchasing power in view of the toll of disease.

This boils down to the fact that a healthy population produces more and better and buys more. A sick population is a poorer customer and a poorer salesman of products.

(c) The subcommittee notes further that there is tremendous significance to this subject of international research and assistance from the standpoint of American foreign policy.

The nature of the image of America in the eyes of the world will crucially shape the capacity of our country to deal with other nations—friendly, neutral, or otherwise.

The image of America as a generous humanitarian supporter of man's improved health is not only a favorable image but is a well-justified image in the eyes of foreign peoples. That image can be still further improved.

As indicated earlier, it is not the purpose of this subcommittee to delve into the substance of our foreign relations with other countries, because that is obviously the province of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The committee, however, does recognize the important foreign policy implications of its work and seeks to strengthen the efficiency of our country in serving the objectives of foreign policy.

WHAT IS THE STAKE OF JOHN Q. CITIZEN IN THE EFFICIENCY OF MEDICAL RESEARCH?

The stake is enormous. As Senator HILL pointed out yesterday with such clarity, medical discovery is of deep significance to every man, woman, and child in the United States and literally to generations unborn.

The following estimates were compiled for the subcommittee at its request by the National Health Education Committee. The statistics document the toll taken by disease in the United States. Current estimates are that somewhere in the United States, every half minute, someone dies of cardiovascular or renal disease. Every 2 minutes, cancer obliterates a life; every 5 minutes, an accident kills, every 10 minutes—pneumonia. Every 19 minutes diabetes; every 29 minutes cirrhosis of the liver. Every 33 minutes—suicide; every 41 minutes tuberculosis; every 51 minutes ulcer of the stomach and duodenum.

The efficient expenditure of dollars or of counterpart currencies for medical research is therefore of crucial importance.

WHY THE EMPHASIS ON INTERNATIONAL MEDICAL RESEARCH, AS SUCH?

Because medicine and science have always been international. All discovery draws from and contributes to the pool of findings throughout the world, as Senator HILL so rightly observed.

Most American physicians are agreed that it is in the field of international cooperation that medical research faces many of its brightest opportunities for accelerated and evermore fruitful discovery.

Of course, no nation has a monopoly on scientific genius. All of mankind has benefited from the discoveries of the Frenchman, Pasteur; the Scotsman, Fleming; the Canadian, Banting; the Belgian, Vesalius; the Italian, Spallanzani; the Dutchman, Leeuwenhoek; the Swede, Arrhenius; the Englishman, Lister; the Japanese, Noguchi; the Pole, Curie; the Austrian, Semmelweis; the Greek, Hippocrates; the German, Koch; the Spaniard, Casal, and from other individuals of diverse nationality.

The great American and foreign talent which may be found, for example, in the National Institutes of Health in Bethesda has its counterpart in talent in public and private research facilities and laboratories throughout the world.

WHAT IS THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE ROLE OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND OF PRIVATE INDIVIDUALS AND GROUPS IN THIS STUDY?

The relationship is a crucial one. American medicine is rightly based on the system of private practice. Traditionally, therefore, the American people look to private sources for both international medical research and assistance.

As was noted in these questions and answers earlier, the subcommittee has proceeded on the basis of contacting every private medical source whom it has had reason to believe could contribute to the study.

The subcommittee acknowledges with deep appreciation the enormous assistance which has already been given by such outstanding organizations as the American Medical Association, the American Nurses Association, the American Dental Association, the American Hospital Association, the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association and similar professional groups.

Literally dozens of specialized medical organizations, for example, in the fields such as tropical medicine have helped. So have others like the World Medical Association, the International Union Against Cancer, the International Congress of Cardiology.

In addition, the subcommittee has made every effort to enlist the judgment of the great variety of American voluntary organizations—both sectarian and lay groups. Within the committee files are to be found a panorama of reports from American voluntary organizations; from religious groups, for example, as well as from lay organizations like Medico and the American Public Health Association and from groups which have concentrated in coping with individual diseases. The latter include the American Heart Association, the American Cancer Society, the National Foundation, the National Multiple Sclerosis Society, the Muscular Dystrophy Association, the Arthritis and Rheumatism Foundation, United Cerebal Palsy, Association for the Aid of Crippled Children, Leonard Wood Memorial, National Association for Mental Health, National Association for Retarded Children, National Tuberculosis Association, to cite but a dozen such groups with international interests.

American foundations likewise have been a source of invaluable reports.

On December 18, 1958, at the invitation of the National Health Council, in New York, which represents 63 American voluntary health organizations, the staff's project director presented a report on behalf of the chairman of the subcommittee. The report was greeted enthusiastically by the assembled members. Of particular interest was the announcement that one of the subcommittee's future publications (to be issued some months hence) will be a document devoted exclusively to a description of what is now being done in the field of international activity by American voluntary organizations. It was the consensus of council members that such a document could, in itself, be of considerable importance to the American voluntary movement.

The subcommittee cannot stress too emphatically that it seeks to encourage American voluntarism at home and abroad, for example, through the American Council on Voluntary Agencies working in international assistance efforts. Teamwork between private and public groups, each doing in its sphere what it respectively can best do and yet each cooperating on matters of common interest, is the key to the future of the health of our own and other peoples.

WHAT INFORMATION HAS THE SUBCOMMITTEE PUBLISHED AND DOES IT PROPOSE TO PUBLISH?

The committee issued as an initial committee print a 117-page publication entitled, "International Medical Research," which was prepared by the National Institute of Health at the subcommittee's request.

Other publications shortly to be printed are:

(a) "Statutory Authority for Medical and Health-Related Research by Federal Agencies: The Basis for International Cooperation" (a Library of Congress compilation which will indicate the need to supplement existing authority for international programs).

(b) "The Status of World Health—In Outline and Chart." (A report prepared by the U.S. Public Health Service at the subcommittee's request. It will indicate by maps and diagrams the overall dimensions of international health problems, in contrast to any piecemeal view.)

Sometime thereafter, the committee will publish "Interim Report of the Subcommittee on Reorganization and International Organizations Pursuant to Senate Resolution 347." (This will provide an outline accounting of all existing Federal budgets in this field.)

It should be noted that publication of this interim report will naturally be dependent upon decision of the total subcommittee membership. However, 4 of its 6 members are new to this activity. Thus, earlier publication of an interim report was not feasible since the commencement of the 86th Congress in January 1959 involved the transfer of previous members and filling of vacancies, a task not completed until last week.

Of the previous seven-man subcommittee, only two past members are included in what is now the new six-man membership.

The interim report will accordingly reflect the views of the full present membership.

Numerous other publications are also scheduled for subcommittee consideration in the months thereafter. They include:

(a) "International Activity of American Voluntary Health Organizations" (mentioned earlier).

(b) "The Armed Forces and Medical Research" (which will indicate the military's stake in war and in peace in health research).

(c) "International Health Activity by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics" (indicating Soviet governmental activity, bilaterally and multilaterally, in the health field).

HOW IMPORTANT IS IT THAT THE SENATE PROCEED IN THIS STUDY IN RELATION TO OTHER DEVELOPMENTS NOW GOING ON?

Very important. A whole series of events at home and abroad is shaping up which underline the significance of this review. Thus:

(1) At this very time, the World Health Organization is making a study toward expanding medical research.

For this purpose, it is utilizing $300,000 which had been wisely tendered by the United States of America at the General Assembly of the WHO, which met in Minneapolis in May of last year.

(2) At this very moment, too, the World Health Organization is in the process of consideration of plans for an International Public Health and Medical Research Year.

The Senate, itself, had unanimously resolved for the consideration of such a year through Senate Resolution 361, 85th Congress, which it approved in August 1958.

In September 1958, the Ukrainian Socialist Republic offered a draft resolution in the United Nations, proposing such a year.

In January 1959, the United Nations General Assembly unanimously approved the resolution.

It is expected that the International Public Health and Medical Research Year will take place, commencing the middle of 1961.

There is not an exact parallel between this proposed year and the International Geophysical Year, in which 66 nations participated. Nevertheless, leading medical experts at home and abroad believe that the year could serve as an important milestone in world health.

It should be further noted that in 1960, under the auspices of the World Federation for Mental Health, there will be observed World Mental Health Year.

(3) In the Congress, itself, a wide variety of legislation is coming up in this field. As I pointed out at the start of my remarks, Senator LISTER HILL and Congressman JOHN FOGARTY are offering tremendously significant companion bills to establish a National Institute for International Medical Research, under which $50 million would be annually authorized for supporting overseas medical research projects.

All of these and other developments underline the significance of the Senate's obtaining a full understanding of precisely what the Federal Government is now doing and how these Federal activities can be made more efficient.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I point out that this study is being conducted under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Government Operations. We are not proposing new programs, but rather an accounting of the efficiency, adequacy, and performance under established programs carried out under acts of Congress by the executive departments and agencies of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, as amended.

The resolution (S. Res. 42), as amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That for the purpose of continuing the study provided for in S. Res. 347, Eighty-fifth Congress, agreed to August 18, 1958, the Committee on Government Operations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdiction specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to examine, investigate, and make a complete study of any and all matters pertaining to the international activities of Federal executive branch departments and agencies relative to worldwide health matters, and of any and all matters pertaining to intergovernmental relations between the United States and international organizations of which the United States is a member, as provided for in rule XXV (1) (g) (2) (B) and (D) of said Standing Rules of the Senate, and of any and all matters pertaining to international health research, rehabilitation, and assistance programs, including but not limited to (1) the general level of authorization of funds for the future to enable the programs efficiently to achieve their purposes, including the use of United States appropriations and foreign currencies generated by American aid and sales of farm surpluses; and (2) the coordination of programs related to international health, on the part of interested United States Government agencies, including but not limited to, the programs of the Department of State, the International Cooperation Administration, the United States Information Agency, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Atomic Energy Commission, the Veterans' Administration, and the National Science Foundation, in appropriate cooperation with nongovernmental organizations.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, from February 1, 1959, to January 31, 1960, inclusive, is authorized to (1) make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority is authorized at its discretion to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings under this resolution and S. Res. 347, Eighty-fifth Congress, together with its recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than January 31, 1960.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $45,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

The title was amended so as to read: "Resolution authorizing the Committee on Government Operations to make a complete study of all matters pertaining to international activities of Federal executive branch departments and agencies in the field of health and medical research."

THE NAVAL RESERVE FORCES

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, at a time when the Nation is increasingly coming to realize the importance of maintaining flexible and mobile armed forces to deal with any military threat, without necessarily resorting to nuclear war, it is always reassuring to discover the very high state of training and readiness of the Reserve forces of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and National Guard.

I might point out that the Reserves' high morale and efficiency is doubly remarkable in view of the mistaken deemphasis of the administration on Reserve training.

Americans can take real pride in their Reserve forces. And in Minnesota, we are very proud indeed of what we think is the outstanding Naval Air Reserve station in the Nation. Yes, the Reserve forces at the Naval Air Station of the Twin Cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul last year demonstrated a degree of proficiency and spirit which is truly unique among the naval air activities in the country.

NAS, Twin Cities, has become the most consistent prizewinner among our naval air stations.

The Naval Air Establishment's Edwin Francis Conway Trophy for overall efficiency is recognized as the top Naval Air Reserve training stations award of them all. This trophy is awarded in an annual competition among all the Naval Air Reserve training stations in the United States. This year there were 22 competing. In past years there have been as many as 28.

In 1958, the Twin Cities Naval Air Station won this top award for the third consecutive year.

The number of competitors seems to make little difference to the Twin Cities station. Of the 17 years during which the Conway Trophy has been awarded, this air station has now earned it a total of five times—the last three times being consecutive. It is the only station in America to have won it so many times.

This tribute reflects the thought expressed last March by the Arab-speaking newspaper Al Aman, published daily in Rabat, Morocco. Referring to one of the station's patrol squadrons which had been selected to train with the Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean, the Moroccan paper commented:

> It is doubtless true that Minnesota enjoys a favored position in the United States and these men prove that her sailors are among the best.

I do not wish to overemphasize the efficiency of this station, because efficiency without effective training would be of little value to our Armed Forces. However, the effectiveness of the training offered at the naval air station is also a matter of remarkable record. Of the eight types of flying squadrons the station has eligible to compete for Noel Davis awards, which are given for excellence in the training offered, the station garnered five this year—making it the only station to receive so many. Five wins out of eight tries. This brings to 10 the total number of Noel Davis awards captured by the station's squadrons since resumption of the competition in 1946.

This year's winners are Squadron VF–812 commanded by Comdr. A. L. Kane, Squadron VP–814 commanded by Comdr. M. F. Carpenter, Squadron VA–813 commanded by Lt. Comdr. C. C. Zuel, Squadron HU–811 commanded by Lt. Comdr. G. L. Strommen, and FASRON–816 commanded by J. F. Bachmeier, commander.

Previous winners include Squadron VP–814 commanded by Comdr. M. F. Carpenter, Squadron VPFAS–815 commanded by Comdr. R. G. Glumack, Squadron VF–811 commanded by Lt. Comdr. J. M. Smith, Squadron VA–813 commanded by Lt. Comdr. L. J. A. Rasmussen, and Air Wing Staff–81 commanded by Capt. P. R. Norby.

In the interests of defense, the variety of training offered at the naval air station of the Twin Cities ranks high in the official ratings. It trains transport squadrons, anti-submarine-warfare squadrons, fighter squadrons, attack squadrons, fleet air service squadrons, helicopter squadrons, patrol bomber squadrons, in addition to various support groups necessary to the operation of a total of 22 squadrons.

The training total on the air station rolls include 2,200 men, of whom 370 are pilots The station also provides host facilities to a number of surface training units which will bring the total number of men trained there to almost 4,000 a year.

When it is realized that a pilot can be kept at a high peak of efficiency for only a few thousand dollars through this Reserve program, compared to the $90,000 it would take to replace one who leaves the service, it can be seen that the 370 pilots alone save the taxpayers a sum that is worthwhile saving, while at the same time the Nation is provided with critically important Reserve strength for instantaneous deployment.

Other categories of trainees offer similar savings to the country and its taxpayers.

It is important to point out that the entire Twin Cities and Minnesota community, as well as a few of our friends from neighboring Wisconsin, make this saving possible for the American taxpayer.

Of course no air station could exist without a modicum of public support. None could reach the championship performance of the naval air station without the full fledged support of the many communities it serves.

In the Twin Cities we look upon the air station more as a part of our community than as a part of a force that is controlled somewhere else. Its men are our men, its performance is our performance, and only the faculty of this efficient training program comes from elsewhere. Its victories are our victories, and its problems are ours to solve.

As one who takes part in the appointment of young men to the Naval Academy at Annapolis, I am proud of the fact that the citizens of Minnesota through their naval air station have received appointments for 13 men in the Academy last year and plan to receive appointments for even more this year. They have perfected a program for picking outstanding young citizens for naval service. The quality of the men being offered from this program cannot be disputed. They showed their interest in the Navy by joining its Reserve. They showed their competence under the watchful eyes of naval officers who recommended them highly. In addition they took the same competitive examinations offered all enrollees.

We are proud of the fact that our naval trainees at this station—which I believe is farther from the sea than any other on this continent—contributed $60,000 to local charitable functions during the past 3 years, often being the largest single contributor. In addition it has contributed a sizable amount to the National Navy Relief program.

Additionally, we are proud of the fact that the Naval Air Reserve station and its men are considered part of every major civic event in our communities. It would be almost as unthinkable to have a civic event without their participation as it would to neglect inviting the mayor. These neighbors of ours give freely of their time both to the difficult work of learning their arts of national defense, and the improvement of the communities which support them so well.

We know that we have more than enough men well trained at home to man the Navy's largest craft, but better than that, we know that they are trained in a diversity of arts that make a complete defense possible while offering considerable strength to the rest of the Nation on its northern border.

I am grateful for this opportunity to pay honor to the entire Naval Reserve, as well as to these young Minnesotans and Wisconsinites who have become an outstanding example to Naval reservists throughout the Nation of what can be accomplished by serious minded young men, backed by vigorous community effort.

TAX TREATMENT OF FARM COOPERATIVES

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, Mr. A. M. Camp, the president of the North Pacific Grain Growers, Inc., has brought to my attention a resolution passed by that organization during their meeting in Portland, Oreg., on January 16 and 17 pertaining to the tax statement of farm cooperatives.

Because of the importance of this subject I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks in order that my colleagues may have the benefit of the thinking of grain growers in the Pacific Northwest.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> The Farm Cooperative provides a method whereby individual farmers may associate themselves into a business enterprise.
> The sole purpose of such business organization is to provide business services at cost and thereby reflect additional profit-making possibilities to the individual member's own farm operations.
> The heart of this farm cooperative business association is the contract between the member and the association which legally describes methods of operations and legally spells out the fact that any profits made off the individual member's volume of business belongs to that member and not to the association. The tax implication consistently follows the single tax principles involved in partnerships. By law farmers are granted the corporate form as a practical method of administering these partnership contractual relationships.
> In light of the foregoing, North Pacific Grain Growers, Inc., recommends that Congress (a) establish clear and concise legislation to once and for all establish the single tax principle for farm cooperatives, and (b) establish concise law to provide that any and all patronage refunds be taxed at face value in the farmers' hands at the date of issue or notification.
> Copies of this resolution to be forwarded to all Pacific Northwest Senators and Congressmen, and to all local member organizations.

TOWARD A NEW FARM POLICY

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, my attention has for some years past been directed toward the need for a new and constructive approach to the solution of our farm problems. Far too often the glib generalization in this area has had currency far beyond what is deserved. Propaganda to the effect that farmers have been hurt by rising industrial wages, for example, has received wide circulation, although, as shown by the Committee on Economic Progress publication, Toward a New Farm Program, this is an erroneous statement. As I have said before, the prosperity of our Nation depends upon the general welfare of all segments of our population. What is good for the farmer is good for the laboring man, and vice versa.

To document the statement that a farm depression hurts both workers and consumers, I ask unanimous consent that an excerpt from the CED publication, which can be found on page 22 of the booklet, be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To count the hurtful effects of the farm depression upon others, we must look at our whole economy. During the 6-year period 1953–58, our total economic expansion (averaging only 1.3 percent a year) has been considerably less than a third of the amount needed for full production and full employment. In consequence, our total national production has been more than $150 billion below full production. Man-years of employment opportunity have been about 10 million too low. The average American family, for this 6-year period as a whole, has had about $2,800 less income than it would have had with full prosperity for all.

How have these trends, so damaging to our whole economy, been influenced by the farm depression? All of our economic trouble has come largely from a deficiency in private consumption, which during the 6-year period as a whole has been equal to about 63 percent of the total production deficiency. The farm population, during this period, has averaged only about 12½ percent of our total population. But the deficiency in consumer spending by farm operators' families alone has amounted to about 17 percent of the total deficiency in private consumption.

Farmers are also big spenders for capital goods, even when their incomes are depressed. And it is clear that capital expenditures by farmers would have been much higher if agriculture had enjoyed prosperity. During the 6-year period 1953–58, the deficiency in capital spending by farmers came to almost 28 percent of the deficiency in total private capital spending.

During this period, the deficiency in farm operators' net income has been about 23 percent of the total income deficiency of all American consumers.

In 1958, total true unemployment in the United States was about 3.4 million higher than in 1953. Comparing the same 2 years, farm employment (as measured by the Department of Agriculture) declined by more than 1.3 million. The decline in farm employment thus was a substantial factor in the increase in unemployment throughout the Nation.

Putting all of these facts together, it may be estimated that somewhere between one-fourth and one-third of our gigantic deficiences in total production and employment opportunity, during the past 6 years, have been due to the farm depression.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the converse of this axiom, namely, that deficient incomes of others hurt farmers, is also well stated in an excerpt from the same publication on pages 29 and 33. I ask unanimous consent that these excerpts be included at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The farm depression is due mainly to bad national farm policies. Nonetheless, deficient incomes and consumption in other parts of the economy aggravate the farm depression.

For the 6-year period 1953–58 as a whole, the total personal income of the American people was almost $134 billion below the amount needed for full production and full employment. This resulted in a deficiency of almost $96 billion in total private consumption. And as part of this, American families spend more than $32 billion less for food, clothing, and shoes than they would have spent under full prosperity conditions. Allowing for the spread between what the consumer pays and what the farmer gets, this reduced farm marketings by about $11 billion. It reduced net farm operators' income by about $4.7 billion.

There has been propaganda to the effect that farmers have been hurt by rising industrial wages. Just the opposite is true. Farmers have been hurt by the failure of wages and salaries to expand enough to help maintain full consumption and full prosperity for all. During the 6-year period under review, the deficiency in wages and salaries was almost three-quarters of the total deficiency in consumer income. In 1958, the deficiency in wages and salaries was more than four-fifths of the consumer income deficiency.

This is doubly significant to farmers, because wage earners spend much more of their total income for food than higher income families. Families with incomes under $2,000 spend about 70 percent of their income for food; families between $3,000 and $4,000 spend more than 40 percent; while families above $10,000 spend only about 18 percent.

The wide extent of poverty among nonfarm families has an especially hurtful effect upon food consumption. American multiple-person families with annual incomes below $3,000, and single-person families below $1,000, now number almost 7 million. It is estimated that the annual food expenditures of these families are more than a billion dollars less than the requirements for a moderate satisfactory diet. If these families could afford an adequate diet, it would lift total consumption of various food products in amounts ranging from 1 to 3 percent. This would be more than the surpluses of many of these products. Additional production would be needed.

The farm depression is due largely to falling farm prices. But it is also due to rising industrial prices—the administered prices of the things the farmer buys. In addition, rising consumer prices for food and clothing decrease the real consumption of farm products; they also prejudice the consumer against the farmer. And rising prices for other consumer items cut into the amount which the consumer can spend for food and clothing.

A sound approach to the farm problem requires that we know the causes of this price inflation. Especially, we must understand whether there is a connection between wage trends and price inflation. For the opinion is widespread—though not correct—that rising wages have been responsible for the price inflation so damaging to farmers and others.

In the period leading up to the recent economic recession, administered industrial prices rose rapidly. And the profits earned by great industries which lifted their prices were enormous; their profits rose far more than their prices. Accordingly, this is very clear: Even with the wage increases which actually occurred, these prices could have been held steady—or raised very little—and still yielded fair profits. Looking at administered consumer prices, the situation was much the same.

During this same period leading up to the economic recession, the profits of leading corporations rose very much faster than wage rates. Correspondingly, investment in the means of production outran consumption. The most serious economic recession since World War II resulted. And even after a sharp recession in their own sales commenced, these big industries, instead of reducing prices to expand sales, raised prices still faster. Administered consumer prices also rose rapidly during the recession.

The agitation against wage earners, undertaken by the same forces who have been deflating farm income, seems to be part of an effort to divide farmers and workers. This hurts both groups. It benefits only those between the farmer and the consumer, who buy farm products too cheaply, and who hire labor for less than they should pay.

Of course, those who work for wages in agriculture are paid far less than industrial workers. But the remedy is not to reduce industrial wages; it is to lift farm wages. The very low level of farm wages has a depressive effect upon agricultural life. And if farm wages today are high relative to the farmer's ability to pay, the remedy is to restore farm income.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the solution proposed by the eminent economist Leon H. Keyserling and his associates in the CED pamphlet is one worthy of very careful study by all of us who are concerned with the problem. It is a solution which will not receive a unanimous vote, of this I am sure, but it is a new approach and one which contains the very careful thinking of an expert in this field. I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from the booklet containing the recommendations of Mr. Keyserling be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY AND THEME: A FULL PROSPERITY BUDGET FOR AGRICULTURE

Our national farm policies have become bankrupt. The urgent task now is to commence their liquidation. This action should not be negative. It should take the positive form of an entirely new national farm program.

The new need is to restore moral justice and economic soundness to agriculture. In addition, the prolonged farm income depression is hurting our entire economy sorely. The slow erosion of our farm plant jeopardizes our future food and fiber needs. The mounting farm surpluses and their public cost are but one vivid aspect of failure throughout our whole economy to translate our tremendous technological progress into wise utilization for the benefit of all. Today, in other key sectors of our economy, surpluses of productive power over use—represented by idle men and plants—are much bigger than the farm surpluses. While we need constant shifts in the composition of production and employment, the total adjustments must result in full production and full employment for the whole economy.

The new farm program proposed in this study is geared to these broader objectives. It urges a short-range and long-range full prosperity budget for agriculture. This involves coordinated goals for: Expanded domestic and overseas consumption of American farm products, farm production and employment adjusted to consumption, and farm purchasing power rising toward income parity with others. It would seek to achieve these farm objectives consistently with maximum production, employment, and purchasing power for the economy as a whole. It would thus, for the first time, apply to agriculture the purposes and approaches of the Employment Act of 1946.

THE THREE MAIN ASPECTS OF THE FARM FIASCO

First and foremost, since World War II—and mostly after 1951—there has been a vast deflation of farm income. Since 1947, the farmer's income from all sources has been pushed downward 23 percent in real terms, while incomes of the nonfarm population have moved upward 48 percent in real terms. After a brief upward flurry in 1958, farm incomes and prices are again moving downward. Our farm families now have only about 50 percent of income parity with other groups. Morally, in a great Nation capable of economic justice for all, this is unconscionable.

Second, the farm plant is being eroded by this income deflation. Farm families—the vital human element in agriculture—are being driven off the land, without opportunity for full employment at good incomes elsewhere. The "factory in the field" is supplanting the family type farm. And this change, instead of lifting farm living standards, is accentuating the impoverishment of farm families. The land care and machinery needed to conserve and prepare agriculture for the growing needs of a growing population are being neglected. To achieve good diets for all American families, and to add fairly to the food and fiber supply of the free world, would require nearly one-fourth more U.S. farm production by 1964 than in 1957.

Third, the accumulated farm surpluses, and the public costs of an irrational farm program, are mounting by leaps and bounds. Since the middle of 1952, accumulated wheat stocks have become 6 times as large, and cotton stocks have risen from approximately zero to about 1 million bales. The Government investment in farm surpluses is now about 5 times (in constant dollars about 4 times) as high as it was in mid-1952, and the funds in the Federal budget devoted to agriculture are now more than 6 times (in constant dollars about 5 times) as high as in fiscal 1952. The net losses to the Government on the farm program, during the past 5 years, have averaged almost 5½ times as high annually as during the preceding 7-year period.

These farm surpluses and public costs would be undesirable but not intolerable, if they represented programs contributing to the prosperity of more than 20 million farm people and to general prosperity. But these surpluses and public costs are intolerable, when they have resulted from the same national farm policies which have thrown farm families into an enduring depression and hurt the whole economy.

INJURY TO OUR WHOLE ECONOMY AND WORLD POSITION

Viewing our economy as a whole, the failure since the end of the Korean war to translate our rapidly advancing technology into full use has cost the Nation idleness of plant and manpower representing more than $150 billion worth of lost production, and about 10 million man-years of unemployment in excess of minimum levels. It appears that somewhere between one-third and one-fourth of our total slack in production, during the past 6 years, stems directly from deficiencies in farm income and purchasing power. In recent years, the decline in farm employment has contributed very substantially to the rise in unemployment in the United States. The notion that our economy in general can be sufficiently prosperous, despite agriculture in distress, is therefore a myth.

On a worldwide scale, so-called overproduction of food in the United States, while literal starvation confronts more than half the world, weakens the humanitarian underpinning of our international policies. We offer to the rest of mankind the spectacle of a Nation which seems not to care sufficiently about others, or which is unable to marshal the brains or the will to meet the challenge of abundance. This travesty is heightened when millions of American families suffer malnutrition.

The farm depression and its manifold consequences are too serious for political recrimination or maneuvering. There is no room for pride in past programs, and no room for passing the buck with respect to current programs. In the final analysis, the farm problem is merely a prime example of our overall failure to achieve the full prosperity and abundance for all which our burgeoning technology makes not only desirable but mandatory. Therefore, a complete reconstruction of the national farm program could well be the first step in a great reappraisal of our total economic performance as a Nation. Especially since sputnik, we have talked much about this great reappraisal, but done little to get it started.

THE FATAL FLAW IN THE FARM PROGRAM

The overwhelming flaw in our recent approaches to the farm problem can be stated simply. The prevalent theory has been that organized protection of farm prices or income was the reason why farmers were producing too much; that this overproduction was depressing farm prices and incomes despite this expensive protection, and that systematic and continuous removal of this farm price or income protection would lead 5 million uncoordinated farmers—guided by free market prices without other regulation of production—to a neat adjustment of supply to demand. And this adjustment, according to the theory, would soon make agriculture prosperous and everybody else happy. In short, the effort has been to solve the farm problem by a steadfast backward movement toward letting farmers get whatever prices and incomes they could while producing whatever they would.

To put this in another way, we have sought to solve the farm problem by asking agriculture to return to the laissez faire economics of the 19th or early 20th centuries. This is an approach which all the rest of our economy—and all the rest of the thinking world—has abandoned since the great depression of the 1930's, and abandoned still further in the face of the great problems of today. In our economic life and national policies generally, we have—while maintaining the essential initiative and freedom of our enterprise system—substituted conscious organized efforts for laissez faire. In many major sectors of our economy except agriculture, production is regularized or rationalized, and prices and other incomes are deliberately fixed or administered. Usually this is done through private action, where the particular group concerned is able to take such action. Frequently it is done through public action, or a mixture of private and public action.

These profound changes have not been without some defects. Certainly, the power of huge industries to administer prices needs to be tempered by much more private restraint and public scrutiny. Nonetheless, the substitution of order for chaos has brought great improvements in our economic structure during the past quarter century, and nobody now wants to cancel out these gains. These changes have liberated the American economy in general from the periodic ravages of depression. Under these circumstances, to thrust agriculture backward toward a complete laissez faire position which has not worked, while others are moving forward toward purposeful coordination, condemns agriculture by decree of national policy to an exploited position in American life. The farmer is being forced to sell for whatever he can get, and to buy for what others ask.

To be sure, national farm policy still intervenes with a series of disconnected, inconsistent, and improvised measures. But these combinations of one step forward and two steps backward are no substitute for a deliberative, consistent, and purposeful national farm program. The results thus far are dismal.

The recent decision of corngrowers to accept less price protection in exchange for less production restraint is likely to have further unfortunate results. At best, this decision represented a choice between highly undesirable alternatives, forced upon farmers by a rigid and relentless national farm policy. If we can learn even an iota from experience, we must know by now that the so-called freedom for agriculture now espoused by the Department of Agriculture means more farm income depression, more surpluses, and more public costs.

THE EMPLOYMENT ACT OF 1946 SHOULD BE APPLIED TO AGRICULTURE

The new approach to the farm problem herein proposed is that agriculture, instead of being dispossessed from our general economy, should be incorporated into the mainstream of our general economic efforts. The farm sector of our economy should be brought under the influence of the same philosophy and practices which have been helpful to many other sectors.

Toward this end, the Employment Act of 1946 should now be applied in a practical way to the farm problem. This act calls for the periodic establishment of goals for maximum employment, production, and purchasing power, and for an integrated set of private and public economic policies directed toward the achievement of these goals. The Employment Act is not now being sufficiently used. But its utility and soundness are now without serious challenge.

A FULL PROSPERITY BUDGET FOR AGRICULTURE

Specifically, the application of the Employment Act to agriculture would mean this: The President, with the aid of the appropriate executive departments, would be required to submit to the Congress at least once a year a full prosperity budget for agriculture. This would contain short-range and long-range goals for expansion of the consumption of farm products, taking into account both our growing domestic needs and our fair world responsibilities. It would equate these consumption goals with goals for the short-run and long-run readjustment of farm production and farm plant, taking account also of new farm technology. It would favor the family type farm, as an economically efficient and socially desirable unit of production. It would facilitate the movement of some farmers to full employment at full pay in other parts of the economy. It would employ credit tools, income protection tools, and other inducements, toward the achievement of all these adjustments through the voluntary cooperation of farmers.

And of highest priority, it would embody income goals for farm families, designed to reward appropriate production adjustments with a level of farm income and living standards moving gradually toward parity with that of other Americans. The public costs of the new farm program, which would form a part of this prosperity budget for agriculture, would be rationalized and reduced, because the public costs of a bad farm program have already been proved far higher than were these costs under a better though insufficiently good farm program.

And finally, through this operation under the Employment Act, full prosperity for agriculture would be meshed with full prosperity goals for the whole American economy. This would help to maintain better balance between the agricultural and the industrial sectors, not only with respect to production, but also with respect to employment and incomes. In view of the very rapid pace of agricultural technology, even fully expanded consumption may not forestall some further contraction of acreage and total farm employment. But we must make sure that any transition is sensible rather than brutal; and that those moving from agriculture are absorbed by full employment and maximum growth for the economy as a whole.

This step forward would not be a panacea. But it would, for the first time in a long time, bring reason into the whole farm program. By outlining clearly where we wanted to go, it would provide a continuing inventory of the merits or defects of specific and detailed farm policies and programs. By incorporating justice into its income objectives, it would promote the voluntary cooperation of farmers toward the regulation and rationalization of production. This end has not been, and never can be, achieved through the harsh deflation of farm income. And it would bring to the farm program the essential support of other groups, by developing a farm program good for everybody because it would be good for agriculture, and good for agriculture because it would be good for everybody.

THE NEEDED PRIORITIES OF ACTION

This fundamentally new approach should precede continuance of debate on the details of price support formulas, production payments, and production adjustments. For this kind of debate, without the needed reorientation, has long been flying in the dark. It has resulted in one crashlanding after another.

The argument that this new approach would substitute a managed agriculture for a free agriculture has no more merit than the same argument when raised unsuccessfully against vast improvements in other sectors of our economy. The new approach would merely substitute a voluntary but intelligently coordinated farm effort for a hodgepodge of errors, a prosperous agriculture for a depressed agriculture. It would make full use of our abundant capabilities for the benefit of people, and move forthrightly against the dire economic threat to our enterprise system which our current failure to deal with the farm problem thrusts upon our whole economy.

This study has been directed by Leon H. Keyserling, with the assistance of Mary Dublin Keyserling and Philip M. Ritz.

NEW PROGRAM: A FULL PROSPERITY BUDGET FOR AGRICULTURE

THREE BASIC ELEMENTS IN A NEW FARM PROGRAM

A new national farm program must provide workable short-range and long-range answers to three basic questions: First, how much consumption of foods and fibers do we need and want for domestic and international use, consistent with our other needs and wants in a fully expanding economy? Second, what kind of farm plant—including human and other resources—will produce amply but not excessively to meet these consumption requirements, with a reasonable margin of safety? Third, and of transcendent importance, what kind of farm family income will conserve and improve this productive plant, and provide farm families with incomes and living standards moving gradually toward parity with others?

Not even the shadow of such a national farm program now exists. There are hardly any long-range goals or efforts toward adequate expansion of consumption. The farm productive plant is being eroded by farm income deflation, and further distorted by accidental events and by hit-or-miss random efforts. And the only goal for farm income, judged by results, is deflation.

These three evils interact. They require a unified remedy. The task is to substitute a good long-range national farm policy for a medley of disjointed efforts which are no unified policy at all.

WE SHOULD APPLY THE "FULL EMPLOYMENT LAW" TO AGRICULTURE

More than 12 years ago, in the Employment Act of 1946, the Nation embarked upon a policy of historic significance. This act required the President to set forth in his annual economic reports to the Congress a unified overall economic program. The three prime objectives were defined as maximum levels of production, employment, and purchasing power. The Congress was then to evaluate this program, adjust it, and enact legislation to carry it out. Many aspects of this program need to be cast in a long-range perspective to be meaningful. The purposes of the Employment Act are now being honored by the executive branch mostly in the breach, but this problem is not within the scope of this study.

The Employment Act could be applied most usefully at once to the farm problem. It is suggested that the Employment Act of 1946 be amended, to require that the President send annually to the Congress a short-range and especially a long-range full prosperity budget for agriculture. This would set forth domestic consumption goals and export goals for farm products, and needed levels of production to achieve these goals; needed levels of employment, meaning the farm plant—human and otherwise—best suited to square with this volume of production; and needed levels of purchasing power. meaning goals toward the gradual attainment by farmers of income parity with the nonfarm population.

This could bring order out of chaos in national farm policies. And by relating these policies to the Employment Act, it would mesh farm prosperity objectives with full prosperity objectives for all.

MODEL PROSPERITY BUDGET: PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION

Compared with 1957, we have the resources to increase our total national production by about $70 billion by 1960, and by more than $180 billion by 1964. Employment should rise by almost 4 million by 1960, and by more than 8½ million by 1964. Average family income should be almost $2,000 higher by 1964.

Per capita consumption of farm products has not grown appreciably during recent years. But this is because the very large number of low-income families (who would spend much more for food if their incomes were much higher) has not been reduced substantially under conditions of low economic growth and high economic slack. Sustained full employment and maximum economic growth would in itself speed the reduction of poverty. In addition, programs for improved income distribution (such as improved minimum wages and social security payments) are essential for full employment and maximum economic growth. There should also be special programs of food distribution to the needy.

In a full economy, per capita meat consumption by 1964 could be more than 12 percent higher than in 1957; consumption of dairy products and fruits and vegetables more than 9 percent higher; of cotton, almost 10 percent higher; and of tobacco, more than 8 percent higher. Allowing for population growth, consumption gains would be even greater.

Internationally, in the original Federal budget for fiscal 1959, outlays for economic and technical development overseas were projected at less than $1 billion. Nothing is more important to the cause of freedom and permanent peace than that we lift these outlays greatly at once, and to an annual level of about $2½ billion by 1964. This would help to reach an overall level of farm exports about one-third higher than recent levels by 1964. We should work more effectively with international food organizations. And our long-range program for the international flow of farm products should be an essential part of a full prosperity budget for agriculture.

Taking into account domestic consumption and exports, total production and use of American farm products should rise by almost one-fourth by 1964. By then, compared with 1957, meat and poultry production and use should increase by more than one-fourth; eggs and dairy products, and fruits and vegetables, should move upward by more than one-fifth. With adequate exports, wheat use can be lifted by almost 20 percent; cotton by almost 30 percent; and tobacco by more than 18 percent.

MODEL PROSPERITY BUDGET: THE FARM PLANT

Due to upward trends in farm productivity and yields, the size of the farm productive plant cannot be expected to grow in proportion to the vast increases in production and consumption. With rare exceptions, notably vegetables and fruits, existing or even reduced acreages and other units of production will be ample. The guidelines of the Prosperity Budget can help to keep these plant adjustments in line with production and consumption goals. This would avoid surpluses of the size resulting from an erratic farm program.

The prosperity budget does not imply compulsion. Farmers who have tried to cooperate in hit-or-miss production adjustments, accompanied by income deflation, will certainly cooperate voluntarily in rational production adjustments, induced by fair income treatment.

National farm policies should also be used to reverse the trend toward excessive concentration of holdings. This can be helped by limiting the size of farms receiving assistance, or the amount of assistance to any one farm—or by both. There can be no defense of public payments of $100,000 or more to individual farmers. There should be a ceiling on payments, designed to extend justice to farmers and not to enrich anyone. Farm policies should protect and augment the family type farm. In 1958, it is estimated that the family type farms numbered about 41 percent of all farms, and accounted for about 58 percent of all sales of farm products. The 1964 goal should point toward family type farms accounting for close to two-thirds of all farms, and an even larger percentage of total sales.

The number of farms too small in size or too frail in resources to offer anything but eternal poverty to their occupants should be sharply reduced. Some can be lifted to thriving family type farms. And an overall full prosperity program would help some families to move from farm poverty to an American living standard elsewhere.

FARM CREDIT AS A TOOL

Farm credit should be amplified at lower costs. The volume and types of public farm credit should be part of the full prosperity budget for agriculture and be geared to production, plant, and income goals.

MODEL PROSPERITY BUDGET: FARM INCOME

By 1960, compared with 1957, net farm operators' income should be lifted by almost $5 billion, and by 1964 by almost $11½ billion. Farm income from all sources should be lifted by more than $6 billion and more than $14 billion, respectively. Allowing for some reduction in the farm population, per capita farm income should rise even more rapidly. Even these goals would bring the farm population by 1964 only to 80–85 percent of income parity, on a per capita basis, with the nonfarm population. And with a farm program which improved rather than worsened the distribution of income, the great majority of farm families who now live in poverty could by 1964 have annual incomes in excess of $4,000.

PRICE SUPPORTS, PRODUCTION PAYMENTS, AND OTHER INCOME MEASURES

In some cases where price support programs will remain desirable, price levels should be related to income goals. Otherwise, the parity price concept is misleading. Even when the farmer got 100 percent price parity a few years ago, he was getting about 50 percent of income parity.

In other cases, production payments or other forms of direct income supplementation should be used, sometimes in combination with price supports, and sometimes while letting prices find their own level. There are cases where this would reduce the public costs of fair farm income protection, and also result in lower prices to consumers. Further, the problem of expanding our farm exports calls for variety in the methods used to improve farm income.

But it would be erroneous and costly, at this stage, to get bogged down again in conventional formulas for protecting farm income. This approach has not yielded good results because there have been no adequate perspectives to guide it. The first vital step is the full prosperity budget for agriculture. Then, for the first time in a long time, we shall know where we want to go, and be able to get there.

THE PROSPERITY BUDGET AND PUBLIC COSTS

To commence a new farm program solely with an effort to reduce public costs would put the cart before the horse. The current farm program started this way; and costs have nonetheless soared because the farm program itself has failed. If we balance farm production and consumption, adjust the farm plant accordingly, and rescue both farmers and our whole economy from the tremendous economic burden of a depressed agriculture, the public costs of the farm program will be much lower and will also be worthwhile. In a full prosperity budget for agriculture, we would be able to schedule realistically both costs and benefits, because we would know where we were going.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the subject of our national policy for agriculture, what it is and what it ought to be, should be the concern of every thinking citizen. It is my judgment that Mr. Keyserling and his associates have rendered a true public service in presenting their thinking on this most vital policy area. I hope that it will stir up a great public debate on this issue, for literally, the very existence of our country is dependent in the final analysis upon our continued ability to produce and distribute food and fiber.

In this connection also, Mr. President, I should like to bring to the attention of the Senate the views of a highly respected constituent of mine, Mr. Harley Libby. Mr. Libby has for many years been associated with the Oregon Farmers Union, and he speaks with deep conviction from an intimate informed knowledge of the problems of Oregon agriculture. I ask unanimous consent that a letter from him under date of January 5, 1959, be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OREGON STATE FARMERS UNION,
Salem, Oreg., January 5, 1959.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: The beginning of 1959 seems a most appropriate time to wish you health and happiness for a constructive new year.

It also seems proper at this date to outline briefly the stand of the Oregon Farmers Union on a few pertinent points of legislation that are quite sure to be considered at this session of the new Congress. You will note that our position will be generally consistent with that expressed on previous occasions.

For example, the farm program:

CONTROLS

We believe some system of production controls to be necessary.

We believe any method of limited production should be determined on a unit basis of pounds, tons, bushels, etc. We have always advocated this plan.

Surely production controls based on our best acres—highly fertilized—have long since demonstrated their failure to cut surpluses.

PRICE SUPPORTS

We believe in a program of realistic price supports spread to cover much more than the six so-called basics, and geared to maintain a supply sufficient to our needs.

Any system of price supports based on less than a fair and equitable price cannot be very real.

DIRECT PAYMENTS

We believe all production payments should be made directly to the farmer who produces the commodity, and not by the way of the processor-jobber trickle-down system.

DEFINITE DOLLAR LIMITATION

Last, but certainly not least, we believe that there should be a definite dollar limit on the amount of production payment that may be earned by any individual producer.

Had this limitation been in effect, it would have effectively prevented some very objectionable features of excessive payments in the past.

Individuals may produce as much as they please, but will have definite dollar limitation on price protection.

May we point out certain freedoms under this plan, and a simplicity of administration.

SOIL BANK

We believe in the principles of the Soil Bank program in that it is more logical and economical to store natural fertility against a time of future need than to trade dollars with a fertilizer company and store surpluses.

COLUMBIA BASIN CORPORATION

We believe in the principles embodied in the Columbia corporation bill.

We feel there would be greater possibilities of securing new and needed multipurpose projects under the system of financing provided in this act.

We are frankly afraid to yield ground on the preference clause, feeling that it offers a protection we dare not lose.

We are necessarily intent on some method by which we may recapture some part of our losses at Hells Canyon.

REA INTEREST RATES

We are against increase in REA interest rates.

We know, and appreciate, the great and long-awaited services brought to rural America by this department. We believe the public interest has been well served and that only the most dire necessity would justify increases.

SURPLUS FOODS

We are for a food stamp plan to be used in the orderly movement of our surpluses to those in need.

SOCIAL SECURITY

We do not favor increased dollar benefits at this date. We would, however, urge the addition of medical care, with perhaps certain limits.

With today's cost of medical care and hospitalization it is not logical to believe that many people on social security income could personally finance any serious illness.

TAXATION ON ABILITY TO PAY

We would reaffirm our position that income should be the basis of taxation.

We are opposed to the proposed increases in Federal gas tax. The levy is now heavy, and new highway projects proceed at a speed that does not promote economy.

Senator MORSE, you well know the economic condition of this Nation's farmer. You will not be misled by the statement that farm income is up.

One needs to remember that the income is being divided between fewer and fewer people. Our diminishing numbers are tragic evidence of the many farm families who have left the land.

The growth of vertical integration and corporation farming points to more and more market monopoly and a further displacement of homes and people.

The Farmers Union has a real concern in what is happening. We believe that the people themselves are the greatest resource of any nation and that they have even increased importance in a democracy.

The task of bountiful production by our Nation's farmers has never been excelled. We take just pride in that record, though we agree that logical controls, though unpopular, are necessary to preserve order.

Any farm program will cost some money, but may we respectfully point out that a maintained and bountiful supply of farm commodities has great value to every individual citizen. Food and clothing are vitally important even to national security, though it is seldom mentioned.

We believe that a sound farm program that insures protection against cold and hunger needs no apology. It can justify its costs.

Our sincere thanks for your good support in the past and our continued hope for your intelligent understanding of our philosophy.

Yours sincerely,

HARLEY LIBBY,
Oregon State Farmers Union.

FOREIGN RELATIONS BRIEFINGS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, as my colleagues know, the executive branch arranged for a series of four hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations at the request of the distinguished committee chairman. More than usual attention was given to providing the committee members with the broad background information about an extraordinarily complex world necessary if they are to perform their functions most intelligently. Entrusted with this task were the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, and the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Now that these hearings have taken place, I wish to express my gratitude to the Chief Executive and to the gentlemen who came before the committee. It is, of course, only courteous to thank extremely busy men for taking so much time away from their vitally important duties. But more than the motive of courtesy impels me to speak on this subject. Frankly, I thought the briefings comprehensive, generally excellent and most useful.

Much of the information given to the committee was not new or startling. However, it is my impression that we received in goodly measure what we asked for: namely, what our French friends would call a tour of the horizon.

The natural consequence of such briefings is concentration upon what is now going on in the world and where we stand with respect to these events. The representatives of the Executive gave us this appraisal with, in many instances, a praiseworthy degree of frankness.

It is true that the limited time at our disposal did not permit us to explore many issues as fully as we might have wished. I, for one, would welcome more lengthy sessions of this character. But the absence of dessert does not diminish my appreciation for an excellent main course, and I want my appreciation to be recorded.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

FAMINE CONDITIONS IN NORTHEASTERN BRAZIL

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, a few weeks ago I noticed renewed press reports of famine conditions and unrest in northeastern Brazil. I wondered whether our Government was taking the humanitarian interest in that situation implicit in our claim to be a good neighbor. Therefore, I asked the Department of State to give me what information it could on our attitude and actions with regard to this distressing problem.

First, let me say that our officials concerned with the area responded with praiseworthy speed and frankness in giving me a full report on the issue. Secondly, and most important, I was gratified to learn that our Government had consistently shown its interest and readiness to help alleviate the undoubted suffering in a large region of Brazil.

In summary, the United States since last March has expressed its willingness to provide assistance on, roughly, eight different occasions, and has complied with three of the four official Brazilian requests that were formally made. Since our current Public Law 480 agreement with Brazil was signed on December 31, 1956, among other items some 788,300 tons of wheat, 2,730 tons of lard, and 1,650 tons of butter have been delivered to Brazil against local currency payment.

Mr. President, I believe that the State Department report given me on this subject is most instructive, especially concerning the complexities of administering a program which is of such obvious benefit to the United States and to other countries. I ask unanimous consent that excerpts of the report be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Just behind the coastal plain of the northeastern hump of Brazil lies an area of some 300,000 square miles which is chronically deficient in rainfall and which frequently suffers droughts in varying degrees. An estimated 10 million people live in this region. The permanent nature of the problem in this area may be deduced from the provision made in the Brazilian Constitution of 1946 (art. 198) that the Federal Government and the governments of the states in the area must each spend at least 3 percent of annual tax revenues to combat the effects of the drought and to relieve the afflicted population.

The 1957–58 rainy season (December to March) was shorter than usual, with torrential downpours that broke many storage dams and then ceased abruptly to leave the rapidly drying out earth to parch without relief. In an area normally self-sufficient in food, the livestock suffered from lack of feed and were slaughtered excessively. Entire crops were consumed, leaving little or no seed for replanting. As food supplies ran out, many stricken families left their homesteads in the sparsely settled hinterland and trekked to the coastal cities to seek jobs and food. Supplies were rapidly exhausted and considerable suffering resulted.

When this situation was first reported in the Brazilian press on March 21, 1958, our Embassy in Rio de Janeiro entered into liaison with the Brazilian Government agency immediately concerned with the drought problems. These discussions revealed clearly the confidence of the Brazilian authorities that food supplies on hand and available for movement to the stricken area were adequate. Upon his return to Rio de Janeiro from an inspection trip to the northeast, the Secretary General of the Brazilian Coordinating Council for Food Supplies informed our Embassy on April 7, 1958, that the situation was under control but that a request might soon be made for United States assistance in furnishing additional dried milk.

On April 11, 1958, our Ambassador called on President Juscelino Kubitschek, of Brazil, and discussed the drought situation and possible United States assistance. President Kubitschek said at that time that he was going to visit the northeast and that he might later wish to consult further with the Ambassador with respect to such assistance.

On April 25 a U.S. Air Force C–124 plane flew 19 tons of Brazilian foodstuffs from Rio de Janeiro to the drought area, supplementing similar flights of smaller Brazilian Air Force planes.

Both the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF) and the National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC) have had extensive programs for dried milk distribution in operation in northeastern Brazil for some time. Their stocks on hand were sufficient to cope with the immediate emergency but were rapidly depleted by the abnormally heavy demands arising from the severity of the drought. The UNICEF program was supplemented by a donation of some 1,000 tons of Canadian dried milk.

On April 28, the local representative of the National Catholic Welfare Conference submitted a request to the International Cooperation Administration for 1,000 tons of nonfat dried milk to expand the NCWC program in the drought area. This request was made formal by a Brazilian Foreign Office note delivered to the Embassy in Rio de Janeiro late on May 2. Arrangements were made immediately for shipment of 500 tons of dried milk from New York on May 5 and the remaining 500 tons about a week later, the shipments arriving in Brazil on June 4 and 12, respectively.

Embassy Rio de Janeiro continued to follow closely the drought situation and on May 16, 1958, U.S. Ambassador Briggs wrote to the Brazilian Minister of Foreign Affairs a note which contained the following statement: "I assure you that my Government is ready to consider sympathetically any request that may be made by your Government for appropriate cooperation under the provisions of Public Law 480."

The Brazilian press carried stories on May 31 of the interest expressed by the U.S. Congress (the Cooley committee) in Brazil's drought disaster and called attention to the readiness of the United States to assist. On June 3 our Embassy in Rio de Janeiro reported that the existing Brazilian Government programs were being largely successful in alleviating the situation, and that a request for United States assistance was unlikely at that time.

On June 17 Ambassador Briggs called on the Secretary General of the Brazilian Foreign Office, informed him of direct-assistance requests which the Embassy had received from the Governor of the State of Paraiba and from business groups in the State of Piaui, and reiterated the willingness of the United States to provide foodstuffs if the Brazilian Government so requested. He was informed that the situation was well in hand and improving.

At about this time, however, private business sources informed the agricultural attaché of growing, urgent need for livestock feed in the drought area. This information was passed on to Washington and preparations for an immediate response to any Brazilian request was undertaken.

On July 30 and 31 our Embassy at Rio de Janeiro reported that corn was urgently needed for livestock feed in the drought area and that the Brazilian Government was preparing to request it under title I of Public Law 480. Inasmuch as the legislative authority for the necessary amendment to the existing Public Law 480 agreement with Brazil had expired June 30, 1958, the Embassy was instructed to tell the Brazilian Government that we would be willing to consider the necessary amendment when the required legislative authority was reenacted. After renewal of the Public Law 480 legislative authority on September 6, Embassy Rio de Janeiro was authorized, on September 17, to exchange notes with the Brazilian Foreign Office amending the December 31, 1956, Surplus Agricultural Commodities Agreement to provide for 40,000 metric tons of corn under title I, Public Law 480. When informed, on September 25, of our willingness and ability to go ahead with this sale of 40,000 tons of corn, a Brazilian Foreign Office spokesman indicated that there was now little likelihood of concluding such a transaction because of the time which had elapsed and the availability of corn elsewhere at lower prices.

On October 23 Embassy Rio de Janeiro reported that it had received an informal request for purchase by the Brazilian Government of 20,000 tons of corn and 2,000 tons of butter. The Brazilians were advised that there was no butter available for sale under title I of Public Law 480 at that time but that our corn offer was still open. On October 29 our Embassy delivered a formal note to the Foreign Office informing it that we were prepared to issue a purchase authorization for 40,000 tons of corn if such were desired by the Brazilian Government. On November 22 the Brazilian Government told Embassy Rio de Janeiro that the corn was now urgently needed. Nevertheless, no reply had yet been made by the Brazilian Government to our Embassy's note of October 29, so that the necessary amendment of the 1956 agreement had not been accomplished.

On November 26, 1958, a representative of the Brazilian Embassy in Washington called at the Department of State to discuss his Government's urgent need to obtain 40,000 tons of corn, 40,000 tons of rice and 40,000 tons of beans (of unspecified type), before December 15. Subsequent telephone conversations informed the Brazilian Embassy that no rice was available for title I sales. In lieu thereof, the Brazilian Embassy expressed a desire for 40,000 tons of grain sorghum.

On December 3 the Brazilian Embassy requested that the above-mentioned emergency foodstuffs be furnished immediately, without awaiting settlement of the complex question of the appropriate exchange rate to be applied to current sales of agricultural commodities to Brazil under the 1956 agreement. This request was met and on December 12 the 1956 agreement was amended by an exchange of notes here in Washington to provide for the desired commodities. On December 18 the purchase authorization for 40,000 tons of corn was issued. The purchase authorization for 40,000 tons of sorghum was issued on January 6. Details of actual purchases by the Brazilian Government under these authorizations, and delivery schedules arranged by them are not yet available. Issuance of a purchase authorization for beans has been delayed awaiting receipt of information from the Brazilian Government as to the type of beans desired and will, of course, depend on the availability of that type.

Meanwhile, in the course of the conversations in Washington regarding the title I sales of beans, corn and sorghum, the U.S. representatives repeatedly pointed out to the Brazilian Embassy officers that a title II, emergency-type program could probably be justified if the Brazilian Government cared to request such assistance. On December 3, 1958, the Brazilian Embassy informed the Department of State that no request for a title II program was being considered by the Brazilian Government. On December 5 at a meeting between Assistant Secretary of State Rubottom and the Brazilian Minister of Finance the possibility of a Public Law 480, title II program to relieve the effects of the drought in Brazil was discussed. The Minister again indicated that the Brazilian Government did not plan to request a title II program.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR FILING AND PRINTING OF AMENDMENTS TO THE HOUSING BILL

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, notwithstanding the adjournment of the Senate today, amendments to the housing bill may be filed today and ordered printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL TOMORROW AT 11 A.M.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its deliberations today, it stand in adjournment until tomorrow at 11 o'clock a.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, pursuant to the order previously entered, I now move that the Senate stand adjourned.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock p.m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Wednesday, February 4, 1959, at 11 o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

I Samuel 12: 24: Only fear the Lord, and serve Him in truth with all your heart; for consider how great things He hath done for you.

Almighty and ever-blessed God, whose divine providence supplies all our needs, we thank Thee for Thy continuing care and goodness.

Help us to appreciate the many opportunities we have of daily working with Thee and our fellow men in establishing those eternal verities and virtues which Thou hast ordained for the peace of the world.

May we be eager to join hearts and hands with men of every nation who are striving to lead groping humanity out of darkness and confusion into the light and glory of a better day.

Hear us in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

SUNDRY MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Ratchford, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed concurrent resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 2. Concurrent resolution continuing the Joint Committee on Washington Metropolitan Problems; and

S. Con. Res. 5. Concurrent resolution to print additional copies of a committee print entitled "Briefing on the Investment Act."

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RAILROAD RETIREMENT BENEFITS

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have programed several bills to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 so as to provide increases in benefits. One of the bills heard before the committee today was H.R. 1273 that I filed on the first day of the session. A similar bill was approved by the committee at the last session but was not considered by the House. I wish to offer my statement before the committee in favor of this legislation:

We are well aware that our common-carrier transportation system and especially the passenger branch of that service, is in serious difficulties.

The Congress knows the importance of the railroads to our people and our economy. I am confident that legislation will be enacted, providing tax relief or subsidies, in order to maintain adequate railroad service.

At the same time, we must show some consideration for the railroad employees who have devoted their lives to this type of work in the expectation of receiving adequate retirement annuities when their working years have ended.

The decline in railroad revenues is no reason for cutting down the original pledge made to the railroad employees. In fact, the rising cost of living is all the more reason why annuities should be increased to compensate for the depreciated retirement dollar.

The purpose of the bills under consideration is to increase all retirement annuities by about 7 percent, and to increase the minimum daily benefit rate paid for unemployment by an average of 20 percent.

We face the fact that this will increase the annual operating costs of the railroad industry by approximately $125 million. With this bill goes the obligation to enact remedial legislation that will enable the railroads to absorb these costs without financial strain. The railroads are essential. So too, are their skilled workers. We cannot very well come to the aid of one, without providing assistance for the other.

The pride of the railroad worker in his special work is an important factor in the operating reliability and safety of our railroads. We cannot afford any decline in his morale occasioned by neglect of the retirement and unemployment compensation programs in which he has had full confidence up to now.

In a changing economy like ours, with its constantly shifting rewards for work done, we sometimes fail to notice the decline in real security and status of those groups that we take for granted. Then, we suddenly realize that adjustments are imperative.

As the report of this committee stated: "The need for increasing retirement and survivor benefits is obvious in the light of the fact that living costs have increased significantly since the last 10-percent increase in benefits was provided in 1956. The 7-percent increase recommended in the bill (H.R. 4353) will undoubtedly help to alleviate the hardships of annuitants and pensioners who are trying to live on a fixed income. The committee feels that the increase proposed in the reported bill is very modest and should be granted. The committee regrets that the present financial condition of the railroad retirement system and the railroad industry does not permit an increase in benefits by a greater amount.

"There was general agreement until recently that the railroad retirement system was virtually without peer among plans of its kind. However, with the passage of the 1950 and later amendments to the Social Security Act, and the gains made in the past several years by employees in many industries through the adoption of private supplemental pension plans, the railroad retirement system has fallen behind. Recognizing this problem, many Members of Congress have introduced bills proposing to improve the benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act."

This was in the report dated August 12, 1958.

On August 28, 1958, Public Law 85-840 was approved, known as the Social Security Amendments of 1958.

These provided for a 7-percent increase in benefits for recipients of old-age, survivors, and disability insurance. Bigger social security checks went into the mails yesterday to more than 12,500,000 persons, the first to include the increases voted by Congress last year.

So the reasons advanced by the committee in 1958, as to the need for increasing benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act, are even more convincing in February 1959.

REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and ordered to be printed with illustrations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith the annual report of the United States Civil Service Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1958.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 3, 1959.

FOREMAN REPRESENTATION AT COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AGREEMENTS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. DULSKI] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, because I feel that the foremen in American industry are presently captives in the "no man's land" of collective bargaining in American industry due to definitions and restrictions contained in the Taft-Hartley Act, I have introduced H.R. 1802 which is designed to once more restore to the foremen class of people the status of first-class citizens, or an equal status, with all the rights and privileges of the rank and file worker, with all the protection of the laws of the land, and will be able to take their rightful place at the bargaining table, and have a voice and a vote in affairs affecting their welfare.

In modern industry today, we have strong representation for management at the top level—at the bottom level we have strong representation for the rank and file worker. In the middle, we find a vast number of people called foremen with no representation whatsoever operating in a vacuum as a buffer, and sometimes a whipping boy, between management and union in the economic struggle for survival.

I contend that these people, the foremen of America, have a natural right of association which should not and cannot be taken away from them by administrative definition and interpretation of legal verbiage. I contend that the foremen of America have a natural right to band together to process grievances, protect their job security, safeguard their working conditions, and be human beings—the same as any other group of workers. At the present time, neither the law nor company policy provides proper protection for the foremen class of people, although a foreman in American industry speaks for and acts for management. At the same time, in his personal capacity, he is an employee subject to terms and conditions of employment imposed upon him from above—a matter over which he has no control or no voice.

I find no basis for the argument that foremen, through enjoyment of the benefits and fruits of the collective bargaining process, would impair the effective performance of their duties in behalf of management.

On the claim of divided loyalties, we cannot assume that self-organization for collective bargaining would prove incompatible with the foreman's faithful performance of his duties. Such an assumption has never been proved.

Many foremen groups throughout the Nation have been organized, but not recognized, without detriment to their loyalty or efficiency to management goals.

Management's disciplinary powers are adequate to insure faithful and efficient job performance by all of its employees, regardless of title.

The basic argument of the foremen concerns the denial by their employers of the right to participate in the decisions which affect their welfare as employees.

A foreman does not lose his right to serve himself in matters fixing his own wages, hours, seniority rights, or working conditions because he serves his master in others.

The foreman is caught in the squeeze between a gigantic mechanized system that can turn the human element, including foremen, into robots—unless the fundamental and basic human principles, one of which is the right of association, are completely respected and tolerated.

My bill proposes to free the shackles that bind the foremen of America in managerial bondage and restore to them their natural rights and privileges to which they are entitled as a matter of plain, simple, common justice.

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, though my voice is as the voice of one crying in the wilderness, I feel impelled to ask the indulgence of my colleagues while I plead briefly the cause of humanity.

Starvation and want stalk the hills and valleys of my native State. While the press, radio, and television are telling the Nation of the wonderful prosperity we are enjoying, they play down or completely ignore facts that clearly show eight of our States are losing population.

My State of West Virginia has the highest percent of its labor force unemployed. It is significant that the States that are losing population are the same States that are suffering from lack of employment.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that with 8 of the Nation's 49 sovereign States in the throes of a depression, we cannot boast of a stable national economy. With 15.7 percent of its labor force unemployed, my State becomes a liability rather than an asset. They can contribute little toward balancing our national budget at a figure of $77 billion when that amount envisions added revenues based on full employment.

Mining soft coal is my State's leading industry. More than 50 percent of the Nation's annual output is West Virginia production. All of you are aware of the plight of this industry, that 8 years ago supplied jobs for 125,000 miners. Today the State has 41,000 miners employed.

Since this decline in coal has been spread over several years, most unemployment compensation payments have long since become exhausted. Our workmen roam the Nation looking for jobs, and there are no jobs. Meanwhile their families are objects of charity and are living on meager grants of surplus Government foods.

One large coal mining county in my district had a population of 81,300 in 1950. Today, 26,400 are receiving surplus foods. In thousands of homes the only stable meal is the hot lunch the youngsters get in school. Shoes and clothing are being supplied to schoolchildren by charity donations.

And now, Mr. Speaker, instead of a ray of sunlight to brighten their droll existence, dark and ominous storm clouds hover on the horizon and threaten the jobs of some 7,000 of the 41,000 miners now working.

This latest calamity that threatens us is directly chargeable to the overt and deliberate acts of preceding sessions of the Congress. West Virginia, for the past 3 or 4 years, has shared in an export coal market to west European countries. Exports have averaged from 35 to 40 million tons annually. A major share of these exports were from West Virginia.

Now we are to lose these markets. I would like to read into the RECORD the following telegram from the National Bituminous Coal Operators Association announcing the first great blow that we can expect from the $3 billion of American exports going annually into the common market nations of Western Europe:

Western Germany has announced that effective February 16, 1959, a tax of $4.76 a ton will be levied on coal imported into that country. This tax will adversely affect the already hard-hit coal industry of the United States. We normally export 12 to 16 million tons of coal per year to Germany. The tax will not be levied on coal consumed in the coastal area, but will be applicable on about 10 to 13 million tons of coal exported from the United States. Loss of market due to this unreasonable tax will contribute further to the economic distress and unemployment now prevalent in the coal-producing areas of the United States. Your interest and influence in opposing this move on the part of Germany to tax American coal will be greatly appreciated.

EDWARD G. FOX,
President, Bituminous Coal Operators Association.

Knowing that this will be the death blow to one of the Nation's basic defense industries, I have protested to our State Department in vigorous words this blackmail attempt by one of our so-called friends to force the granting of compensatory duty reduction on other imported articles from the common market nations in return for their admission of American goods into the now closed area.

In an effort to block the German imposition of this heavy import duty, which will tax us out of the German market, I have formally lodged with the State Department this following telegram:

C. DOUGLAS DILLON,

Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, Department of State, Washington, D.C.:

On behalf of the State of West Virginia and particularly for our State's soft coal industry, I want to vehemently protest the action taken by the West German Government on January 23, effective February 16, 1959, imposing a $4.76 per ton import duty on soft coal. Action by Germany will exclude minimum of 14 million tons of present soft coal imports from the United States. Sixty percent soft coal production comes from West Virginia. Kentucky, Tennessee, and western Virginia coal fields also affected. Consider this first blow resulting from formation Common Market in Europe. Suggest you read terms General Agreement on Trades and Tariffs at Geneva which forbids formation of bilateral or group agreements by members of the general agreement without the unanimous consent of all nations concerned. Starvation and want stalk the hills and valleys of West Virginia. Loss of 8 to 10 million tons soft coal markets means ultimate destruction of a basic industry absolutely necessary for national defense.

Congressman CLEVELAND M. BAILEY,
Third West Virginia District.

Mr. Speaker, I feel I would be remiss in my duty if I failed, at this time, to discuss what we, here in America, face in the way of competition from the Common Market.

Three thousand miles away, but right in America's commercial backyard, a vast economic upheaval is taking place—the Common Market being formed by six European nations. It will remold Europe's economic life and, ultimately, will mean a multibillion-dollar shakeup in United States-European commercial relations.

On January 1, 1959, France, Germany, Italy, Holland, Belgium, and Luxembourg took the first major steps toward creating their European Economic Community, or European Common Market, as it is more widely known.

Whether these six forms an association with the rest of Western Europe through the British-sponsored free trade area or go it alone, the fact remains that the new year opened an experiment in economic union so bold that it would have been dismissed as visionary only a decade ago.

Even at this point, the six governments' venture, formalized in a treaty signed March 25, 1957, takes a considerable play of imagination to grasp in its entirety.

All tariffs and other trade restrictions on these nations' mutual commerce will be progressively reduced over a 12- to 15-year period until they are finally eliminated.

The six will gradually adopt a single set of tariffs for trade with outside countries and negotiate as a single bloc with other nations.

Through a European social fund and a European investment bank, the six will jointly finance the retraining and adaption of workers hurt in the march toward free trade and back up with loans and guarantees industrial development projects in the Common Market area and in the members' overseas territories.

In short, some 164 million people, long divided by fierce economic and political rivalries, are aiming to create a union whose closest parallel can be found in the union of the United States.

To say that a program of this magnitude and daring—if carried out according to its original terms—will have far-reaching implications both for Eurpoe and the rest of the world would seriously understate the situation.

In fact, it is so big that there are American businessmen dealing with Europe who question whether the six governments will keep to their timetable.

But it would be equally dangerous for U.S. businessmen—even those who do not at present sell goods in Europe—to ignore the Common Market, for there can be no doubt that it will have a profound influence on Europe's commercial relations with the United States.

The clue to what the Common Market means and what its members will or will not do in carrying out their commitments lies less in the day-to-day political events that precipitated its formation than in basic economic trends.

The element of protection comes into the picture because there is a very real danger—almost a certainty—that some U.S. exports will be hurt.

Many American-made goods are already meeting stiff competition as a result of the expansion of European industry.

The freeing of trade within the common market countries (France, Germany, Italy, Holland, Belgium and Luxembourg) is expected to give tremendous impetus to the rationalization of European industry, particularly in those fields where national barriers have impeded the growth of mass production.

This will mean even greater competition for many of the products that enter into the average $2,700 million annual flow of U.S. goods to the six countries.

Of more immediate importance than this long-term trend is the tariff discrimination United States and other nonmember countries will have to contend with.

On January 1 the six governments began their 12-to-15-year program of tariff adjustments. Tariffs are to be cut 10 percent for their mutual trade. Import quotas are to be increased by 20 percent, or more, if they do not come up to an amount equal to 3 percent of the national production of the specific product by the importing country.

Bilateral quotas—quantities fixed for importation from any other individual member of the Common Market—will be combined into one quota covering all of the six governments.

This process will continue until goods produced in any one of the six will be able to move into all of the others without tariffs or quota restrictions. The last possible date for the attainment of this goal, under the treaty, is 1973.

West Germany's action calls for an immediate showdown on the whole international trade program. I see in it the forerunner of whatever other arbitrary steps the European community of nations may decide to take in order to keep out our products. The executive department of this country has been sold a bill of goods that demands full access to our own markets, presumably in return for minor concessions abroad. As West Germany has demonstrated for the whole world to see, even those minor concessions are repudiated at the convenience of the country with which we are dealing.

American coal producers responded without hesitation. From 1954 to 1957 our shipments to that country rose from 1.4 to 15.5 million tons. In the calendar year 1958, the figure was slightly more than 10 million tons, a decline resulting from two primary factors: One, heavy fuel oil moving into Western Europe; and two, a slowdown in industrial activity similar to the general business decline in this country.

American coal shippers took this loss philosophically. All they have asked is an opportunity to compete on an equitable basis. They have been able to put the coal into European ports at prices below those charged by producers on the continent, and the least that they would expect under the so-called reciprocal trade agreements program is an opportunity to hold on to these markets through fair competitive practices. They also expect contracts to be honored. The Bonn action would reportedly shut out about 9 million tons of American coal this year. It would bring additional economic havoc into West Virginia, which is the Nation's greatest coal producer and exporter. Everyone knows how our State has already suffered from the impact of foreign trade policies that permit alien oil to enter our east coast at the expense of the coal industry.

Last year residual oil imports amounted to 170 million barrels—equivalent in energy value to 41 million tons of bituminous coal. For the first 16 days of 1959 this heavy fuel oil from foreign refineries poured into our coastal markets at the rate of 803,900 barrels per day.

Mr. Speaker, if this rate were to continue throughout the current year—and the executive department has thus far taken no definitive action to put a stop to this deluge—the annual influx would amount to 293 million barrels. What is happening is that the coal industry in West Virginia and other producing States is being throttled by a noose in the hands of a gang of international diplomats. Our State Department policymakers go into a calypso every time they hear the beat of a Creole Petroleum oil drum.

I was a member of the subcommittee that held hearings on this problem back a number of years ago and, if you will examine those reports, you will find it difficult to distinguish between the expressed trade theory of the State Department representatives and the executive of the international oil companies.

Now we are not only being subjected to an extended assault on our markets by foreign oil; the export market which we have won through our ability to produce so efficiently is being closed to us. You have heard about the little Nash Rambler that overtakes the Cadillac. What is actually happening is that the little Volkswagen and stables of other pony automobiles are passing American cars in sales in Europe. The American automobile manufacturers not long ago were one of the most vociferous advocates of free trade, but I have noticed that recently there has been a resounding silence out of Detroit on this subject. Of course, some of our manufacturers have set up plants in other countries so that they might take advantage of the cheap labor and supplies, then ship the product to American dealers under our generous tariff program. The result is that American workers in auto manufacturing areas do not get as much work time per year as they would if this Government used the same sort of a protective device that is utilized elsewhere in the world. If a tariff equivalent to the one announced by West Germany on American coal were imposed upon foreign cars, you would hear our friends in Bonn and elsewhere screaming to high heaven. In all probability the State Department would follow the same line, in keeping with its policy of worrying about diplomacy to the exclusion of any concern about the American worker. The automobile worker himself is not the only one who suffers when foreign cars glut our markets. The coal miner who provides an important ingredient of the steel which goes into the automobiles also loses. The railroader who moves coal to steel mills and automobile plants takes it on the chin. The American glassmaker is hurt, as are chemical manufacturers who produce plastics, parts manufacturers, and makers of electrical equipment.

How the American Government becomes involved in policies that open our markets to the products of cheap foreign labor while permitting other countries to bar exports from our shores is difficult to comprehend. We have been giving billions of dollars around the world for more than 10 years, yet at the same time the American taxpayer who makes these donations possible is forced to stand by and see his job taken away from him under the guise of reciprocal trade. I call on my colleagues in Congress to take cognizance of the inconsistencies in our trade program.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to extend remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or to revise and extend remarks, was granted to:

Mr. PORTER and to include extraneous matter.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts to revise and extend her remarks and include two amendments on the GI housing bill.

Mr. BRAY.

Mr. KEOGH.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 7 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, February 4, 1959, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Health Insurance for Senior Citizens

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 3, 1959

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, the welfare of our senior citizens has been, as it should be, a matter of growing concern in recent years, as their numbers have continued to mount in proportion to the population.

The maintenance of an adequate standard of living for senior people and of adequate housing and improved health and medical care facilities for this segment of our population, have been a matter of great concern to government, labor, and industry. Over the past 25 years each has done much to help in these worthwhile objectives.

As a member of the Ways and Means Committee and of the House, I have long taken an interest in social security and other legislative proposals to provide more and deserved comfort and security for people in the later years of their lives. Industry and labor have worked together in the development of improved pension and retirement plans. For some years I have sponsored a bill to extend to the self-employed the same tax-deferrable privileges enjoyed by approved and qualified employee pension plans. I have hopes that that bill, which last year passed the House by an overwhelming voice vote, will be enacted this session or, at the latest, during this Congress.

Unfortunately, progress assuring the 65-plus group adequate means with which to meet the burden of higher costs for medical care has not kept stride with other social welfare advances. Those over 65, generally, have been unable to obtain health insurance coverage.

There are now about 15 million people of age 65, or more, in the United States—about 8.6 percent of the total population—and only about 6 million of these have hospital-surgical coverage. This coverage for the most part is under plans which they paid for prior to age 65 and which plans have advanced to permit retention of coverage after age 65.

It is, therefore, very encouraging to many to note the intensified efforts on the part of the insurance industry and the medical profession to solve this problem and to give to those over age 65 the opportunity of providing for their own medical care costs through private initiative.

The Continental Casualty Co., one of the Nation's largest insurance companies, has pioneered in this field and other insurers are following suit.

The Continental 65-plus policy, after being tested in several States, has recently been introduced in my home State of New York and in seven other Eastern States.

By successfully applying the principle of group insurance to individuals, Continental has found that it is possible to make available, without restriction, basic hospitalization and surgical insurance coverage to those age 65 plus.

This new plan admittedly is not a panacea. For this critical problem, it most certainly does represent a great and feasible stride forward in the expansion of voluntary health prepayment plans for those generally more in need of such protection, and, as such, merits the public recognition by those in government, industry, and labor who long have urged the encouragement of such worthwhile experiments. We shall see.

Dick Neuberger Is Fully Recovered and Will Soon Be Back in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES O. PORTER

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 3, 1959

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to report that our respected colleague and friend in the other body, the junior Senator from Oregon, RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, will return to Washington Thursday, February 12, 1959. He will be accompanied by his wife, Maurine.

It will be good to see them. His many friends have missed him. We were shocked and dismayed last fall when it was disclosed that he was the victim of a cancer the doctors identified as malignant. After a period of anxiety we were somewhat relieved to learn that this cancer was radioresponsive and that the outlook for recovery was excellent.

So it was DICK entered on a long period of cobalt treatments which only recently were completed. Now the official report is that he is wholly recovered. This is heartening news indeed for all his friends and admirers here and throughout the Nation.

Before he knew of his condition he had been in the forefront of the fight to obtain more funds for cancer and other medical research. He is resolved to continue this effort, and his very presence here should win him more allies equally determined.

The statement issued by Senator NEUBERGER's physicians on February 3, 1959, was as follows:

Senator NEUBERGER has completed an intensive course of radiation for the malignant tumor which was surgically removed last fall. He has tolerated the therapy well and has gained 14 pounds in weight. We are gratified with the manner in which he has responded to the treatment program, and we have every confidence in its success. He is returning to Washington next week prepared to resume a normal schedule of activity.

Bloomington, Ind., an All-American City

OF

HON. WILLIAM G. BRAY

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 3, 1959

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that a city in my district, Bloomington, Ind., has been selected as one of the all-American cities by Look magazine and the National Municipal League. This is an honor extended to only 11 medium-sized cities throughout the Nation.

Bloomington is a city with which I have had a long and special association, and its achievements are always filled with meaning for me. It has truly been a second home to me since I first went there as a freshman at Indiana University in 1921, and worked at Wells' Cafe. Throughout the years I have had continued close contact with Bloomington. My wife is a professor at Indiana University and my son is a senior in the law school there.

I have lived in Morgan County, which is adjacent to Monroe County, of which Bloomington is the seat, all of my life, as has my family since 1822. The people of Bloomington are and always have been representative of a friendly, kind, but rugged independence so typical of those living among the rolling hills of southern Indiana. I have known that Bloomington is an all-America city but I am glad to see it receive official recognition.

From long association I know the kind of teamwork which binds the citizens of Bloomington together in one successful civic enterprise after another. I have seen it exemplified in many instances, and I saw it again last fall when they made their presentation before the panel that selected this year's honor cities. I joined the delegation sent out to Colorado Springs, and after seeing first-hand their presentation I felt their selection was assured.

While I was happy to see Bloomington grow and become an increasingly important industrial center, I was fearful that this growth might destroy that friendly, helpful village atmosphere that has made Bloomington such a fine place in which to live and raise a family. But the true greatness of Bloomington is its ability, despite its growth and increasing importance, to remain the kind, friendly community that I knew years ago.

The same judgment applies to Indiana University. One cannot adequately discuss Bloomington without discussing the university, nor discuss the university without discussing Bloomington. Both have lived and grown together for about 140 years. Indiana University has steadily grown from a small but outstanding midwestern school to one of the largest universities in the country and, like Bloomington, it has retained its personal and friendly atmosphere, reflected in its interest in each student.

Perhaps the greatest thing that can be said of any city is that it is a fine place to live. You can certainly say that of Bloomington. It is most outstanding in livability.

Two Amendments To Be Offered to H.R. 2256

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, February 3, 1959

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the following are two amendments which I propose to offer to the bill H.R. 2256, which I understand will come up for action on the floor tomorrow afternoon. I believe it will be difficult for the veterans to pay the high interest rates proposed in H.R. 2256:

AMENDMENT TO H.R. 2256, 86TH CONGRESS, AS REPORTED WITH A COMMITTEE AMENDMENT

Section 2(a) of H.R. 2256, 86th Congress, as reported with a committee amendment, is amended by (1) striking the word "and" before "(2)" and inserting a comma in lieu thereof, and (2) by adding before the period at the end thereof the following: "and (3) by adding at the end thereof a new sentence to read as follows: 'In every case in which a loan is guaranteed under section 1810 and the interest rate is more than 4¾ per centum per annum, the Administrator is authorized to pay out of appropriations directly to the veteran, during the period the property is owned and occupied by the veteran as his home, and at such intervals as he may prescribe by regulations, an amount representing the difference between the interest paid by the veteran on the loan at the rate actually charged, not exceeding the maximum rate chargeable hereunder at the time the loan was made, and the amount of interest that would have been paid had the rate been set at 4¾ per centum per annum.'"

ADDITIONAL AMENDMENT TO H.R. 2256, 86TH CONGRESS, AS REPORTED BY THE COMMITTEE

Amend section 2 of H.R. 2256 by adding a new subsection (c) as follows:

"(c) Paragraph (1) of subsection (d) of section 1811 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: 'In every case in which the interest rate on the direct loan is more than 4¾ percent per annum, the Administrator is authorized to pay out of appropriations directly to the veteran, during the period the property is owned and occupied by the veteran as his home, and at such intervals as the Administrator may prescribe by regulations, an amount representing the difference between the interest paid by the veteran on the loan at the rate actually charged and the amount of interest that would have been paid had the rate been set at 4¾ percent per annum.'"

Mr. Speaker, it is important to legislate additional money for GI loans. I feel the veterans fare better if they can secure loans under VA auspices.

COMPARISON OF GI LOANS AND FHA LOANS

There are certain definite advantages to GI loan financing over FHA financing from the viewpoint of the veteran borrower and these advantages are present even if the two loans bear an identical interest rate.

The obvious advantage to the GI loan is that it may be obtained for home, farm, or business purposes whereas the FHA has no comparable farm and business loan program.

Other advantages of GI loan financing are as follows:

First. The GI loan guarantee or insurance is furnished without charge to the borrower whereas FHA loan insurance is paid for by the borrower through a mortgage insurance premium payment of one-half percent per annum on the monthly declining balance of the loan.

Second. The VA valuation of the property fixes the maximum price which the veteran may pay for the property. The FHA valuation is used in determining only the maximum loan amount and the purchaser may pay in excess of the FHA appraisal if he chooses to do so.

Third. The GI loan may be made for 100 percent of the approved purchase price. The FHA loan may be no more than 97 percent of the FHA valuation of the property in cases where the property is valued at no more than $13,500 and for a lesser percentage as the value of the property increases. Consequently, a downpayment requirement exists in FHA insurance authority which is not present in VA authority.

Fourth. The GI loan may be prepaid by the borrower at any time without premium or fee. A prepayment fee of 1 percent of the outstanding principal balance may be required if the borrower wants to pay off an FHA loan before maturity.

Fifth. The VA has authority to purchase defaulted GI loans where the holder refuses to extend indulgence in deserving cases, thereby affording the borrower a further opportunity to keep his home. The FHA has no comparable authority.

Sixth. The VA has more limitations on foreclosure action by lenders which are designed to protect the veteran's interest and prohibit precipitous action.

Seventh. The VA has a statutory directive to release an original veteran borrower from liability under certain conditions where the property is sold and a new purchaser assumes the mortgage indebtedness. The FHA has no such requirement.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1959

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, as in this Chamber, where rise the pillars of a people's hope, Thy servants in the ministry of national and world welfare face perplexing decisions affecting the lives of untold millions who look to them for the wise word and the right action, lift us all, we pray, from the confusions and baffiements of these perilous days into the unhurried calm of Thy presence.

For the preservation of our freedom, for the defeat of all tyranny, for the redemption of democracy from its failures, for the attainment of a just and enduring peace for all the earth, we lift our hearts to Thee, O God of our salvation.

We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

DESIGNATION OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,

RESOLUTION OF OKLAHOMA HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I present, for appropriate reference, a resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Oklahoma relating to the National Defense Education Act of 1958.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and, under the rule, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ENROLLED HOUSE RESOLUTION 511

Resolution commending the members of the Oklahoma congressional delegation for their wholehearted participation in the passage of Public Law 85–864, the National Defense Education Act of 1958

Whereas the Congress of the United States in its wisdom passed the National Defense Education Act of 1958 which will, among other important items, enable the Commissioner of Education to make loans available to students at low interest rates in order that students in need thereof may pursue their courses of study in institutions of higher education; and

Whereas the sums authorized to be appropriated for such purpose amount to $47,500,000 for fiscal year 1959, $75 million for fiscal year 1960, $82,500,000 for fiscal year 1961, $90 million for fiscal year 1962, and such sums for fiscal year 1963 and each of the 3 succeeding fiscal years as may be necessary to enable students who have received a loan for any school year prior to July 1, 1962, to continue or complete their education, the majority of such sums so appropriated going for loans to students; and

Whereas Oklahoma may receive a part of the money so appropriated which amount bears the same ratio to the sums thus appropriated as the number of persons enrolled on a full-time basis in this State bears to the total number of persons enrolled on a full-time basis in all of the States; and

Whereas the passage of said National Defense Education Act of 1958 will mean authorization of approximately $6 million will be made available to higher education students in this State and many promising students will, because of the loans, be able to continue and complete their education: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the 27th Legislature of the State of Oklahoma—

1. That all members of the congressional delegation are hereby commended for their participation in the passage of the National Defense Education Act of 1958.

2. That a duly authenticated copy of this resolution be transmitted by the clerk of the house of representatives to each member of said Oklahoma congressional delegation.

Adopted by the house of representatives the 26th day of January 1959.

CLINT G. LIVINGSTON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

FEDERAL AID TO EDUCATION—RESOLUTION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Northeast Queens Council for Schools, of New York, N.Y., relating to Federal aid to education.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Whereas there is still a serious shortage of classrooms and of teachers requiring emergency action on the part of the Federal Government; and

"Whereas limited financial resources available to many communities are not adequate to support construction programs of sufficient size to eliminate their classroom shortages and not sufficient to provide proper compensation to their teachers; and

"Whereas the national interest requires that the Federal Government assist State and local governments in solving these pressing problems: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Federal Government provide Federal financial assistance on a grant basis to help meet the problems of inadequate facilities and inadequate teachers' salaries by enacting such Federal aid to education legislation in 1959."

Resolution drafted by conference committee of Northeast Queens Council for Schools, resultant from fifth annual Boroughwide conference on educational legislation on this 16th day 1958.

NAOMI GARSTEIN,
President.

THE FIGHT AGAINST COMMUNISM—RESOLUTION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by Our Lady of Fatima General Assembly, Fourth Degree, Knights of Columbus, of Suffolk County, N.Y., endorsing the activities of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the fight against communism.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the activities of Communist, Communist-front, and certain pseudoliberal organizations constitute a present and continuing danger to the liberties of all Americans and the welfare of our country; and

Whereas several of these organizations have launched an attack on the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the House Un-American Activities Committee, and the Justice Department of the United States in an effort to hamper their activities and break down our country's defense against subversion; and

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States has exceeded its judicial functions in laying down rules for the conduct of congressional investigations, which will impede the fight against subversion: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, Our Lady of Fatima General Assembly, in regular meeting assembled, expresses its wholehearted approval and support of the activities of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and its Director, Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, and insists that this organization be given the widest possible latitude to continue its invaluable services in the protection of our country against its enemies abroad and at home; and be it further

Resolved, That this assembly endorses and congratulates the House Un-American Activities Committee on its diligent and tireless efforts in exposing Communist infiltration in our Government, in the professions, and in vital industries, and we demand that this committee be maintained as a standing committee until the Communist menace has been permanently removed; and be it further

Resolved, That this assembly view with consternation and dismay the lawless actions of the United States Supreme Court in usurping legislative functions, including the laying down of rules of conduct of legislative investigations, in contravention of the Constitution; and be it further

Resolved, That Our Lady of Fatima General Assembly call upon its Senators and its Representative to Congress from Suffolk County to block every effort to tear down our defenses against Communist subversion, by appropriate legislation, to spell out broadly and in detail the authority and duties of the Senate and House committees engaged in the fight against subversion, and the duties and authority of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, to the end that they may be enabled to function adequately against subversion without hindrance by the Supreme Court; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to our Representatives in Congress, and we solicit the active support of all loyal Americans in this effort to maintain our present defense against subversive activities in the face of current efforts to destroy them.

FAITHFUL NAVIGATOR.
FAITHFUL SCRIBE.

PROPOSED FEDERAL AIRPORT LEGISLATION—LETTER AND STATEMENT

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter from Clarence R. Miles, manager of the legislative department of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. The substance of Mr. Miles' letter is that the chamber meant to submit its comment on Senate bill 1 and Senate bill 674, the airport bills now under consideration in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, but found the hearings finished before the chamber's views could be formulated.

Inasmuch as it is now too late to publish the chamber's statement as part of the hearings on the airport bills, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Miles' letter to me and the statement transmitted therewith be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C., February 2, 1959.

The Honorable ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SCHOEPPEL: At the time the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee was holding hearings on S. 1 by Senator MONRONEY and on S. 674 of which you are a cosponsor, the chamber's committees and the chamber's board of directors were reviewing all of our policies and relating them to currently proposed legislation. Under these circumstances, it was impossible for us to make a meaningful contribution to the consideration of this important legislation.

As a result of committee study and of action by our board of directors in support of the committee's recommendations, we are now in a position to urge enactment of S. 674 with certain amendments. A statement outlining our position is attached. If the record of the committee hearings has not been closed, I respectfully request that this statement be included therein.

Cordially yours,

CLARENCE R. MILES,
Manager, Legislative Department.

STATEMENT IN BEHALF OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES SUBMITTED BY CLARENCE R. MILES, MANAGER, LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT, FEBRUARY 2, 1959

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States has for a number of years favored a reasonable amount of Federal aid for the development of an adequate nationwide airport system.

In view of the fact that all of our committees and our board of directors would be in Washington to review our legislative program, we felt we should delay any comment on S. 1 and S. 674 until the end of their deliberations.

Our Transportation and Communication Committee reviewed these legislative proposals, in light of chamber policy, on Wednesday and Thursday, January 28 and 29. They made a report to our board of directors on Saturday, January 31.

The board of directors concurred with the view of the Transportation and Communication Committee that the Federal Airport Act should be continued, in the public interest. But it also held that in continuing Federal aid, the Congress should recognize the need for arriving at a balanced budget. The need for balancing the 1960 budget at the lowest possible level of expenditures is imperative because of the huge deficit contemplated this fiscal year.

Consequently, the chamber believes that S. 674, rather than S. 1, represents a more acceptable solution of this problem.

In supporting S. 674, however, we recommend that it be amended in the following manner:

1. Limit aid to the building of a system of airports that is essential for commercial traffic in interstate commerce. In other words, Federal aid should not be available for airports used only for local flying.

2. Clearly state that funds provided should not be employed for the construction or acquisition of administration buildings more elaborate or expensive than is truly essential for interstate commerce traffic. Contrary to S. 674, therefore, we recognize that certain terminal facilities are essential to reasonably meet the needs of commercial air traffic.

3. Provide for the imposition of user charges to recoup Federal aid granted under the new act. Such revenue should come from beneficiaries such as those using the landing areas, including commercial corporation, private and military transport; the community in which the airport is located; and adjacent land owners. Such a plan, we believe, is essential if this program is to produce an adequate airport system and at the same time insure the wisest possible expenditure of public funds.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of a committee were submitted:

By Mr. HENNINGS, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, without amendment:

S. Res. 50. Resolution authorizing the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the textile industry (Rept. No. 48);

S. Res. 65. Resolution authorizing a comprehensive study of problems of the aged (Rept. No. 47);

S. Res. 70. Resolution authorizing the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs to investigate certain matters within its jurisdiction (Rept. No. 46); and

S. Res. 72. Resolution extending the time for filing a report by the Special Committee on Preservation of Memorabilia of the Senate (Rept. No. 45).

By Mr. HENNINGS, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, without additional amendment:

S. Res. 45. Resolution to provide additional temporary staff and funds for the Committee on Public Works (Rept. No. 44).

By Mr. HENNINGS, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, with an amendment:

S. Res. 66. Resolution authorizing a study of the National Labor Relations Act and Labor-Management Relations Act (Rept. No. 43).

ANNA B. MAYS—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. HENNINGS, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 76) to pay a gratuity to Anna B. Mays, which was placed on the calendar, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay, from the contingent fund of the Senate, to Anna B. Mays, widow of Lewis C. Mays, an employee of the Office of the Architect of the Capitol at the time of his death, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE ENTITLED "PROBLEMS OF THE DOMESTIC TEXTILE INDUSTRY"—(S. REPT. NO. 42)

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, last year the Senate approved Senate Resolution 287, which authorized the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to conduct a study of the domestic textile industry. The authority under the resolution expired last Saturday, January 31. Anticipating that event, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce submitted a resolution for an extension of the time, and for an added appropriation of $2,500 to complete its work. This became unnecessary because the study was completed in the meantime. It was delayed somewhat because of the reorganization of the committee itself since the new session of Congress.

I ask unanimous consent at this time to submit, on behalf of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the report authorized under the original resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received and printed, as requested by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, at this time I should like to explain the report. Since the end of World War II we have witnessed economic growth in this country of which we can all be justly proud. Although this growth has been interrupted by three postwar recessions, there has been a substantial increase in employment, production, and personal income which has meant a significant rise in the living standard of the American people as a whole. Unfortunately, not all sectors of our economy have shared in this economic growth. While other industries have been expanding, the domestic textile industry, for example, has been contracting. During the past decade 350,000 textile jobs have been lost in the United States. There are many who believe that during a period of economic growth workers displaced by the contraction of some industries will be absorbed by other industries which are expanding. We know, however, that while this is true to some extent, it is not true in all cases. As a result of the staggering loss in textile employment over the past 10 years, we have seen a growing number of textile communities added to the list of surplus labor areas. Some textile communities have experienced a high level of unemployment throughout the entire decade.

While industrial workers in general have enjoyed the benefits of rising wages even those textile workers who have been fortunate enough to remain employed have shared only to a minor degree in our overall increases in production and productivity. Those who have lost their jobs have experienced serious hardships, and in many cases this has extended over a long period of time.

The decline of the textile industry during a period of general economic growth has been a matter of growing concern to a number of us. On April 2, 1958, the Honorable Frederick G. Payne discussed the problems of the textile industry on the floor of the Senate. Much of his speech dealt with the effects of Federal policy upon this industry. Shortly afterward, on April 14, 1958, the Honorable NORRIS COTTON introduced a resolution—S. Res. 287, to which I have referred—calling for the establishment of a subcommittee to conduct a full and complete study of all factors affecting commerce and production in the textile industry of the United States. I was asked to serve as chairman of this subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Others who served with me included Senators Bible, Cotton, Payne, Purtell, and Thurmond. Of these, only Senators COTTON and THURMOND remain as members of the subcommittee today. I digress briefly to pay tribute to the members of this subcommittee.

In the course of our investigation we held hearings in Washington, in the New England States, in the South, and in New York City. My colleagues faithfully attended these hearings where we listened to the testimony of more than 200 witnesses. They have a deep and genuine concern with the problems of this industry and of the workers who have been displaced by the events of the past 10 years. With me they share the fervent hope that steps can be taken to mitigate the effects of Federal policies upon this industry, and to halt the decline of production and employment which is steadily weakening an important sector of the domestic economy.

I may say, parenthetically, that while $25,000 was authorized for the committee under that resolution, we spent, I think, only about $7,000 to complete the full study.

I would be remiss if I did not pay high tribute to our working staff. Especially are we indebted to the unremitting labors of Dr. William H. Miernyk, Director of the Bureau of Business and Economic Research in Northeastern University at Boston, Mass. He is a renowned author and authority in all the areas of our study. We were most fortunate to be able to enlist a man of his great ability. His cooperative spirit and high sense of responsibility has been reflected throughout our proceedings.

To the loyalty, integrity, and industry of the committee staff we owe a deep debt of gratitude. And to the staffs of the participating Senators we extend our sincere appreciation for their unfailing helpfulness.

The end product of this study has been made possible only through the arduous toil and devotion of many persons of whom their government may well share the pride of our committee.

The findings of this long investigation cannot be detailed here. But I can summarize the highlights. While industrial production in the Nation increased 45 percent, from the base period 1947 to 1949, textile production declined 2 percent. Consequently, textile production has accounted for a dwindling share of total manufacturing output. The production of cotton textiles has dropped about 3 percent, but the production of woolen and worsted goods during this period has declined by more than 44 percent. The only segment of the textile industry to show an increase is that producing fabrics from man-made fibers, but here the increase has been much less than is popularly believed. Over the past 10 years this segment of the industry has shown a gain of less than 5 percent, and it must be remembered that this gain is measured from a relatively small base. As I have indicated, the overall cutback in textile production has resulted directly in the loss of 350,000 jobs.

But the effects of the decline in textiles do not stop here. The textile industry is an important buyer of agricultural and industrial products from the farms, forests, and mines of almost every State in the Union. Some industries—such as the textile machinery industry—sell most if not all of their output to textile mills.

As a result of the decline in textiles there has been a drop in production and employment in other industries which are suppliers to the textile industry. We can trace the effects back further and see that other industries which sell to the textile machinery industry are likewise affected by the decline in textile production. In brief, the problem of the decline in textiles is serious enough if we do not look beyond this industry itself. But if we take into account the effects upon other industries in our economy, the decline in textiles has had far more damaging consequences than is apparent on first examination.

The textile industry is essential to our national defense effort. We spend billions of dollars each year on defense. Some of these expenditures are for research designed to improve our national security. Few would disagree that it is sound public policy to spend whatever is necessary to reduce our vulnerability to attack. But is it sound policy at the same time that we are striving to strengthen our defenses, through an expanding missile program and other similar developments, to allow an industry which produces one of our basic civilian and military needs to decline to the point where our ability to defend ourselves will be jeopardized in the event of a national emergency? We believe not. We are further convinced that to some extent the problems of the domestic textile industry stem from the ways in which various Federal Government policies are administered.

I can only list these policies briefly, but I hope that every Member of the Senate will carefully study our subcommittee report so that he may understand how these policies have contributed to the decline of textile production and employment.

Our agricultural price-support program has resulted in a two-price system for cotton. Foreign textile manufacturers can purchase American cotton at prices about 20 percent below those paid by American mills. This cotton, fabricated into cloth, can then enter our markets at prices lower than American mills can charge and cover their cost of production. In addition, the wages paid to textile workers in countries which export cloth to the United States range from one-half to one-tenth those received by American textile workers. As a part of our program of liberalizing international trade, we have made it easier for these fabrics to enter our markets. The American textile industry has tried to compensate for lower wages and lower raw material prices abroad by increasing its productivity. Although profits in this industry have been shrinking, the industry has gone through an extensive and costly modernization program over the past 10 years. Productivity in the domestic textile industry has gone up much more rapidly than the increase in productivity in the manufacturing industry in general.

But despite these efforts, American mills cannot compete in our own or in world markets with low-cost foreign mills which also have kept abreast of recent technological developments.

Thus our agricultural price support program, and our foreign trade program have both contributed to the loss of domestic textile production and employment. In addition, through our foreign aid program we have expanded textile capacity in countries which formerly purchased textile products from the United States. Partly as a result of the growth of new textile industries in other countries, the domestic textile industry has lost two-thirds of its export market.

If the trends of the past 10 years are continued, at some point we will reach the stage where the domestic textile industry cannot satisfy our basic civilian and military needs in the event of an emergency. If the domestic textile industry continues to decline, other industries which sell their products to textile mills will lose important customers. The hardship which now exists in many textile communities will spread to other communities. If these dangers are to be avoided, a positive program will be required to halt the textile decline; to stabilize production and employment; and to permit future growth as our population increases and as our national income rises. With this in mind, the Textile Subcommittee makes the following recommendations:

First. We recommend the establishment of a permanent interagency committee within the Department of Commerce to deal excusively with textile affairs. This committee should consist of representatives of the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Defense, Labor, State, and the Treasury.

It should also include representatives of the International Cooperation Administration, the Office of Civilian Defense Mobilization, and the Tariff Commission. The Chairman of the Textile Interagency Committee should be the Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Domestic Affairs. To assist the Textile Interagency Committee, we recommend that there be established an advisory committee to consist of three representatives of textile management, three representatives of textile labor, and three representatives of the public at large. In addition, we recommend that at each session of Congress there be appointed a Textile Subcommittee within the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to work closely with the Textile Interagency Committee and the advisory committee.

Second. We recommend that there be instituted within the Department of Commerce a program to improve on the collection and analysis of statistical data which will assist textile management to solve some of the problems internal to the industry.

Third. We recommend that quotas be established which will permit foreign producers of textile products to sell in our markets within limits which will not further endanger existing textile capacity. Furthermore, we recommend that the quotas be established by specific categories of textile products so that no one branch of the domestic textile industry will feel the full impact of imports from abroad.

Fourth. We recommend that agencies responsible for the administration of our foreign aid program make a careful study of the longrun consequences of further expansion of world textile capacity before additional grants be made to other countries to expand their own textile production for the international market.

Fifth. We recommend more realistic interpretation of the current peril-point provision of the Trade Agreements Act and faster action on escape-clause cases brought before the Tariff Commission.

Sixth. We recommend that some proportion of custom duties collected on textile products entering the United States be used to finance research—especially basic research designed to find new end uses for textile products, and economic research which will aid the industry in planning its future production program.

Seventh. Depreciation rates on textile machinery now in effect are obsolete. We recommend that at the earliest opportunity the Internal Revenue Service issue a revised schedule of depreciation rates, taking into account current industry practices which would permit a more rapid writeoff of new equipment for tax purposes.

Eighth. We also recommend that the Finance Committee carefully study the relevant provisions of the Internal Revenue Code, with a view toward revision to protect against abuses under the loss carry-forward and carry-back provisions which now are often used by financial speculators to liquidate textile mills which could be operated successfully.

Ninth. We recommend elimination of the two-price system on cotton. If it is not feasible to eliminate immediately the two-price system on cotton, we recommend that tariffs on imported cotton products be increased by an amount equal to the difference in cost between foreign-produced and domestically produced cotton products resulting from the two-price cotton system.

Tenth. Finally, we recommend that the Foreign Assets Control Division of the United States Treasury Department review its policy toward the importation of partly processed textile fibers from countries with which we do not now maintain normal trading relationships. This policy has been inconsistent and discriminatory. It has allowed finished products made from these fibers to enter the American market, but has prohibited domestic textile manufacturers from purchasing such partly processed fibers from Western European countries, at the cost of many domestic textile jobs.

I should like to conclude by again urging each Member of the Senate to carefully study the report of the Textile Subcommittee. The problems of this industry are serious; and unless positive action is taken to solve these problems, it will only be a matter of time before the domestic textile industry is unable to satisfy our basic civilian and military needs, and we shall have placed ourselves in serious jeopardy in the event of a national emergency.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I wish to make two brief statements:

First, let me say I was a member of the subcommittee; and I should like to take this opportunity to commend the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE] for the fine leadership he gave our subcommittee and for the fair, excellent, and unbiased manner in which he presided over the hearings.

Second, I should like to express the hope that the Congress will take steps to put into motion the recommendations which have been made in the report. The textile industry not only provides employment to more than 1 million persons, but also ranks in importance—second only to steel—as regards the national defense.

I sincerely hope action will be taken soon, in order that the textile industry, which is so essential to the economy of the Nation, can resume its normal operations of past years.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I wish to thank my distinguished colleague, the Senator from South Carolina, for his complimentary remarks, and to assure him and the other Members of the Senate that we had a fine subcommittee which devoted itself diligently to the task assigned to it. Without the keenness of mind and the eagerness and industry displayed by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], I do not believe our report would be as successful as it is. I may say that one of the refreshing things about the report is that it is unanimous.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished friend for his kind remarks.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator from Rhode Island leaves the floor, I should like to add my word of thanks to him and to his subcommittee for the study and the work they have done in this field of operations of the textile industry.

I was glad to support the amendment which was submitted last year—I believe it was last year—by the Senator from Rhode Island, in connection with the mutual security aid bill, if I correctly recall. I thought it was a good amendment. The Senator from Rhode Island and I and quite a number of other Senators had previously, in connection with a mutual aid bill, sought to obtain protection for the textile industry. In fact, that amendment failed of adoption by only one vote, as I recall. It was the amendment which was offered by the late, beloved chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator George, of Georgia.

Last year, we certainly felt that the least we could do would be to make this study. I believe the subcommittee has done a fine job. The textile industry of the Nation is of great importance to many States—in fact, to more States than I believe most persons realize, without thinking through the matter very carefully. The industry is a very important one; and it needs the most careful consideration in respect to protection in its operations, so that the great numbers of persons who are gainfully employed in that great industry may continue to be so employed.

Mr. PASTORE. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

The following favorable report of a nomination was submitted:

By Mr. ELLENDER, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Clarence Ludlow Miller, of Kentucky, to be an Assistant Secretary of Agriculture and to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Commodity Credit Corporation.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MUNDT (for himself and Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota):

S. 912. A bill to amend title II of the Agricultural Act of 1956 so as to provide for the utilization of surplus agricultural products through the use in motor fuels of alcohol manufactured from agricultural products grown on farms in the United States; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. ANDERSON:

S. 913. A bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 with respect to the dutiable status of wood moldings; to the Committee on Finance.

S. 916. A bill amending title II of the Social Security Act so as to permit certain children with respect to whom an individual has stood in loco parentis for several years before such individual retires or dies to become entitled to child's insurance benefits on the basis of the wages and self-employment income of such individual; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. JACKSON:

S. 917. A bill for the relief of Mr. and Mrs. Fred A. Fletcher; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. JACKSON (for himself and Mr. MAGNUSON):

S. 918. A bill to amend the law relating to the construction and operation of public parks and recreational facilities on lands in reservoir areas in order to permit the removal of natural resources where necessary for such purposes; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. GREEN:

S. 919. A bill for the relief of Kenneth Lashley, Jr.; and

S. 920. A bill for the relief of Ralph H. Traher; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 921. A bill to amend the Civil Service Retirement Act to increase to 2½ percent the multiplication factor for determining annuities for certain Federal employees engaged in hazardous duties; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. YARBOROUGH:

S. 922. A bill authorizing El Paso County, Tex., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Rio Grande River at or near the city of El Paso, Tex.; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(See the remarks of Mr. YARBOROUGH when he introduced the above bill, which appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina:

S. 923. A bill for the relief of Christos Psihogios; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SCOTT (for himself, Mr. CLARK, and Mr. CASE of New Jersey):

S. 924. A bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 in order to establish for educational purposes a certain priority in the award of very high frequency television channels; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

(See the remarks of Mr. SCOTT when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. KEATING:

S. 925. A bill to provide for the granting of a nonquota immigrant status to certain immigrants who are the brothers, sisters, sons, or daughters of citizens of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See the remarks of Mr. KEATING when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. MUNDT:

S. 926. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to allow a deduction from gross income for certain expenses incurred by a taxpayer in providing an education for himself, his spouse, and his dependents; to the Committee on Finance.

(See the remarks of Mr. MUNDT when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Mr. KEATING):

S. 927. A bill providing for the Surgeon General of the United States to establish a hospital in the State of New York especially equipped for the treatment of persons addicted to the use of habit-forming drugs; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

(See the remarks of Mr. JAVITS when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. JAVITS:

S. 928. A bill for the relief of Charles Bernstein; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HENNINGS (for himself, Mr. SYMINGTON, and Mr. GREEN):

S. 929. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to allow income tax deductions for certain payments to assist in providing higher education; to the Committee on Finance.

(See the remarks of Mr. HENNINGS when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. HENNINGS (for himself and Mr. GREEN):

S. 930. A bill to extend educational benefits now provided for Korean conflict veterans to persons serving in the Armed Forces after January 31, 1955, and before the termination of compulsory military service under existing laws of the United States; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

(See the remarks of Mr. HENNINGS when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. KERR (for himself, Mr. CASE of South Dakota, Mr. GRUENING, Mr. GORE, Mr. KEFAUVER, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. HILL, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. EASTLAND, and Mr. COOPER):

S. 931. A bill to amend the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, as amended, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Works.

(See the remarks of Mr. KERR when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. KERR:

S. 932. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to increase the amount of expenses paid for the medical care of individuals who have attained the age of 65 which may be deducted for income tax purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. CAPEHART:

S. 933. A bill to increase the annual amount which certain veterans are permitted to earn without being deprived of the receipt of their pensions;

S. 934. A bill to include wholesale distributors of gasoline within the definition of "producer" for purposes of the excise tax on gasoline; and

S. 935. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to reduce from 6 to 3 months the period during which disabled persons must wait before becoming entitled to disability insurance benefits under such title; to the Committee on Finance.

(See the remarks of Mr. CAPEHART when he introduced the above bills, which appear under separate headings.)

By Mr. MUNDT:

S. 936. A bill to amend title VI of the Public Health Service Act, as amended, in order to make certain nonprofit corporations and associations eligible for Federal aid under such title; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

(See the remarks of Mr. MUNDT when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. LANGER, Mr. MAGNUSON, and Mr. PASTORE):

S. 937. A bill to amend the public assistance provisions of the Social Security Act to elminate certain inequities and restrictions and permit a more effective distribution of Federal funds; to the Committee on Finance.

(See the remarks of Mr. HUMPHREY when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. GOLDWATER:

S. 938. A bill to incorporate the Navy Dads' Clubs of America; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 939. A bill to authorize the establishment of the Fort Bowie National Historic Site, in the State of Arizona, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. BUSH:

S. 940. A bill for the relief of Hlias Anthony Lousedes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Br. BUSH (for himself and Mr. JAVITS):

S. 941. A bill to provide that the Secretary of the Interior shall develop and carry out an emergency program for the eradication of starfish in Long Island Sound and adjacent waters; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HENNINGS:

S.J. Res. 45. Joint resolution to establish a commission for the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Gen. John J. Pershing; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See the remarks of Mr. HENNINGS when he introduced the above joint resolution, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. CAPEHART:

S.J. Res. 46. Joint resolution to provide for the designation of the fourth Sunday of September of each year as "Senior Citizens Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RESOLUTIONS

Mr. DIRKSEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 74), which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That Mr. GOLDWATER be, and he is hereby, excused from further service as a member of the Select Committee on Small Business, that Mr. JAVITS be assigned to service on said committee to fill the vacancy, and that his name appear on the list following the name of Mr. SCHOEPPEL.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 75), which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the following-named Senators be, and they are hereby, appointed as the majority members of the Select Committee on Small Business, created by S. Res. 58, 81st Congress, 1st session, as amended, for the 86th Congress: JOHN SPARKMAN (chairman), RUSSELL B. LONG, HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, GEORGE A. SMATHERS, WAYNE MORSE, ALAN BIBLE, JENNINGS RANDOLPH, CLAIR ENGLE, E. L. BARTLETT, HARRISON A. WILLIAMS, JR., and FRANK E. MOSS.

Mr. HENNINGS, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 76) to pay a gratuity to Anna B. Mays, which was placed on the calendar.

AMENDMENT OF TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY ACT OF 1933

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and Senators CASE of South

Dakota, GRUENING, GORE, KEFAUVER, SPARKMAN, HILL, STENNIS, EASTLAND, and COOPER, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, as amended, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may lie on the desk for 24 hours in order that any other Senators who care to may become joint sponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD in the chair). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The bill (S. 931) to amend the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, as amended, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KERR (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

RIO GRANDE RIVER BRIDGE AT OR NEAR EL PASO, TEX.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill authorizing El Paso County, Tex., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Rio Grande River at or near the city of El Paso, Tex.

The purpose of the bill is to permit the construction of adequate bridge facilities connecting the progressive, growing cities of El Paso, Tex., and Juarez, Mexico. The people to be served comprise the greatest population living along a bilingual international border city in the Northern Hemisphere, there being a total of approximately half a million people in the two cities with only two bridges to serve them.

The bridge that is being planned by the farsighted public officials and community leaders in Texas and Mexico would do more than to break up an ordinary traffic jam. It would contribute greatly to the interchange of culture and ideas as well as jobs and services between friends on both sides of the border. Building this bridge would help to build a better good neighbor policy, not only in El Paso but throughout a great area in the Southwest.

Under the bill, the selection of the site for the proposed bridge would be left up to local officials. Local officials plan to finance this work at no expense to the Federal Government. The construction and operation of the bridge would be subject to the approval of the International Boundary and Water Commission of the United States and Mexico, and to the approval of proper authorities in Mexico.

Mr. President, I commend this bill to the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 922) authorizing El Paso County, Tex., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Rio Grande River at or near the city of El Paso, Tex., introduced by Mr. YARBOROUGH, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENT OF COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934, RELATING TO PRIORITY IN AWARD OF VERY HIGH FREQUENCY TELEVISION CHANNELS

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, over the past week the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, of which I am a Member, has heard testimony on legislation to stimulate and encourage the use of television for educational purposes.

One of the principal deterrents to the development of TV stations for educational use is that UHF channels, which have been assigned for that purpose throughout the country, cannot be economically maintained. This is due to insufficient TV sets in circulation capable of UHF reception.

At the same time, only a few VHF channels have been assigned for educational use—but where this has been possible, educational TV has made progress.

In the area south of New York, comprising New Jersey, eastern Pennsylvania, Delaware, and a portion of Maryland, no VHF channel has been assigned for educational TV. Even one VHF channel to cover this area would be highly beneficial. If the Federal Communications Commission can resurvey its allocations and arrive at some solution, whereby more VHF channels can be "dropped" in, the result would serve a wide public interest.

No VHF channel is presently assigned covering the area comprising much of New Jersey, eastern Pennsylvania, Delaware, and a part of Maryland.

Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators CLARK and CASE of New Jersey, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill which would give priority consideration, in the reassignment of a channel operating at very high frequency (VHF) relinquished by the commercial licensee, to an applicant proposing to operate such a station for noncommercial educational purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 924) to amend the Communications Act of 1934 in order to establish for educational purposes a certain priority in the award of very high frequency television channels, introduced by Mr. SCOTT (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. I am glad to yield.

Mr. FREAR. To what channel is the Senator referring in his bill?

Mr. SCOTT. There is a channel which would be affected in this bill, and that is channel 12, the VHF channel operating out of Wilmington, Del.

Mr. FREAR. I want to inform the Senator from Pennsylvania that, of course, I cannot agree with his bill, because I think the Delaware Senators are going to maintain that channel belongs to Delaware. We would be very happy to have one of the channels operating out of Philadelphia designated as an education channel.

Mr. SCOTT. I am sure this channel is one which we would like to see utilized for educational purposes, if possible, and which would be for the benefit of people in parts of New Jersey, eastern Pennsylvania, parts of Maryland, and Delaware. We hope we can get a VHF channel for educational purposes, since VHF cannot be received except by sets capable of being used for that purpose in schoolrooms.

Mr. FREAR. I am sure the Senator will get cooperation from the Senators from Delaware regarding a station which is appropriate to be used for education, so long as a channel is left for Delaware.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE CODE, RELATING TO A DEDUCTION FROM GROSS INCOME FOR CERTAIN EDUCATIONAL EXPENSES

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill designed to grant a special tax deduction for certain expenses of higher education incurred by a taxpayer, his spouse, or his dependents as described in the Internal Revenue Code.

This bill would allow deductions equal to 50 percent of the costs of tuition, fees, and materials required in the course of study. This deduction, as included in the bill, would be treated in the same manner as a legitimate business expense, and would, therefore, be deducted at the time that the taxpayer is computing his adjusted gross income.

Mr. President, the sharply rising costs of higher education are placing a severe financial burden on many American taxpayers, who are conscientiously attending to the educational needs of their children, and I earnestly feel tax relief such as that proposed in this bill is urgently needed to lessen this economic burden. The provisions of the bill will also serve to offer a greater incentive to the many fine young men and women in the United States, who are working and financing the costs of their own college education.

I sincerely hope that the proper legislative committees of Congress will give early and sympathetic consideration to legislation of this type.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 926) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to allow a deduction from gross income for certain expenses incurred by a taxpayer in providing an education for himself, his spouse, and his dependents, introduced by Mr. MUNDT, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

FEDERAL NARCOTICS HOSPITAL IN NEW YORK STATE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and my colleague, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Public Health Service Act to require the establishment of a Federal narcotics hospital in New York State. Representatives VICTOR ANFUSO, Democrat, of New York, and SEYMOUR HALPERN, Republican of New York, are introducing identical legislation in the House.

The measure stipulates that the U.S. Surgeon General may arrange with the State, its political subdivisions, and neighboring States for a jointly operated hospital in New York especially equipped to treat drug addicts. In addition, it provides that "outpatient units" are to be set up to treat persons who are addicted and give followup care after hospitalization. These units could also be financed jointly in cooperation with State and local governments.

The Federal Narcotics Bureau reveals that about 45 percent, or some 21,000, of the Nation's known narcotic addicts live in the New York metropolitan area, including parts of New Jersey and Connecticut. Medical and police authorities report that 2,707 of these users are juveniles under the age of 21. Yet, according to the State Bureau of Narcotics Control, there are no hospital beds for adult drug addicts who voluntarily seek treatment anywhere in New York, and only 200 beds for juvenile addicts. The nearest narcotics hospital is the Federal establishment at Lexington, Ky., 600 miles away from New York City.

These statistics reveal a critical situation which confronts most drug addicts in Northern and Eastern States. Their best chance of getting even a modicum of medical attention enabling them to "shake" the drug habit temporarily rests in admission to a prison hospital ward. And that is where the average addict receives it, at least in New York, to an increasing degree. Twenty percent of all prisoners in New York State jails were drug users at the time of their arrest; and last year, of the 4,772 new admissions, the users totaled 1,068, or nearly 23 percent. Police departments in several major cities like New York and Chicago estimate that as many as one-half of the crimes committed in their jurisdiction are due to drug addiction. If this correlation is correct, then conceivably 54,000 of New York City's rising rate of 108,358 recorded crimes in 1958 would be attributable to this problem. It is estimated that illicit trade in narcotics and crimes committed by addicts to finance their habit drain the U.S. economy of between $300 million and $400 million annually.

In recent years, tougher laws and stricter enforcement have led to the arrest and imprisonment of some of the biggest dope smugglers and pushers. However, it is evident that even by calling out the entire Army, Navy, and Air Force we shall not eliminate entirely the illegal importation and sale of habit-forming drugs. With rising crime rates staring us in the face, we must root out a major cause of criminal activity, drug addiction. That means, according to medical experts, providing special hospital facilities—not more jail cells or prison beds—where users of illegal drugs can voluntarily go for help. If a substantial number of addicts are to be cured of the habit for good and more widespread addition leading to more crimes is to be prevented, then these special facilities must be readily accessible for the medical and psychological treatment and rehabilitation deemed absolutely essential by health authorities.

The bill introduced today represents a continuation of the major effort undertaken last session by myself, Senator Ives, Congressman ANFUSO, and others, through legislation and conferences with Federal, State, and city officials to open a narcotics hospital in New York. At that time, Ellis Island was considered as a site, but it was decided the cost of converting and maintaining the plant for that purpose would be prohibitive. However, we were assured by the Federal Commissioner of Narcotics, Harry Anslinger, that a narcotics hospital established in New York City "would decrease rather than increase the problem of Federal narcotics enforcement." "We are not worried about the smuggling of narcotics into the institution," Commissioner Anslinger reported.

The existence of a narcotics hospital and the setting up of "outpatient units" which will provide medical treatment, guidance, and psychological help for former addicts who have been released will be fully utilized in New York even if the legislature does not enact a compulsory commitment law. Right now, the Public Health Service reports that the typical patient at the Federal hospital in Lexington, which has a 1,000-bed capacity, is a male from the Northeast, probably New York, who has left his family to travel hundreds of miles to Kentucky in the desperate hope of being cured. Nevertheless, the average patient there undergoes three to four cures. Authorities cannot force him to remain the 3 or 4 months generally required; but, regardless, once he is back home, exposed to family tensions and the pressures and temptations of his old environment, divorced from medical or psychological treatment, he usually resumes his drug habit shortly thereafter. Constant repeaters are the rule, not the exception.

Although the bill declares the establishment of this narcotics hospital to be mandatory in New York, ample recognition is given the responsibility of New York, its political subdivisions and adjoining States whose addicts might make use of it, to share in the financial costs involved; therefore, the Surgeon General is authorized to enter into joint agreements with them concerning the operation of both the hospital and the outpatient units.

Shifting our main emphasis to an all-out medical attack on widespread drug addiction, backed up with laws requiring compulsory hospitalization of drug addicts, will prove a much less expensive and more effective approach to a practical and humane solution to a problem which nationwide directly involves 45,000 reported addicts in the United States and their families.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 927) providing for the Surgeon General of the United States to establish a hospital in the State of New York especially equipped for the treatment of persons addicted to the use of habit-forming drugs, introduced by Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Mr. KEATING), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1954, RELATING TO INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS FOR HIGHER EDUCATION

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, to further promote and encourage higher education in this Nation, I believe it wise and just to allow a tax deduction benefit to those who make an effort and sacrifice to send their dependent children to institutions of higher learning, and to allow a tax benefit to our students who are making the effort to earn a higher education for themselves. This is Federal aid without Federal interference.

Therefore, on behalf of myself, the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code so that certain payments which must be made to provide higher education can be computed as a tax deduction. Amounts paid out for tuition and fees, for books, for room and board will be deductible. I also propose that certain deductions be allowed for money that is donated for scholarships.

Similar benefits have been proposed in a bill, H.R. 1264, which Representative W. R. HULL, JR., introduced in the House. I urge consideration of these tax benefit proposals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 929) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to allow income tax deductions for certain payments to assist in providing higher education, introduced by Mr. HENNINGS (for himself, Mr. SYMINGTON, and Mr. GREEN), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

RENEWAL OF GI EDUCATION AND TRAINING PROGRAM

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, this Nation denies to its young men and women who have entered the armed services since January 1955 many worthwhile veteran programs which would benefit them and the Nation. This is, in my opinion, both shortsighted and unjust.

For the first time in the Nation's history, young Americans have been drafted into military service in times of relative peace. They are required to give up from 6 months to 2 years of their private lives for the defense of the Nation. Some minimize this sacrifice by saying we are not now at war. But neither are we now at peace. The members of the armed services constantly are exposed to risk, either potential or actual. The Marines in Lebanon, the Army in Berlin, and the Navy in the Formosa Straits all have been exposed to genuine risk.

Nevertheless, when these young people return to civilian life, they are no longer eligible for mustering out pay; for GI disability not traceable to service; for VA medical care except for service-connected disabilities; for pensions for total disability not traceable to service; for preference in job-finding assistance; or for GI bill education and training. I do not propose that all of these benefits which accrue to other veterans be restored at this time. But I strongly believe that the least we can do as long as we continue to draft our young people is to give them the benefits of GI bill education and training when they have completed their service.

Therefore, on behalf of myself and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to renew the GI education and training program for as long as the draft exists. The extent of the benefits will depend on the length of time on active duty.

Mr. President, we often hear the call for foresighted programs to strengthen the Nation. This legislation is such a program. We know from past experience that the Nation is well rewarded in tax receipts alone from the higher incomes which veterans earn when they have benefited from GI bill education and training. Looking to the future, we can be sure even now that the Nation will more than recover in taxes the expenses of renewing this program. In addition, of course, a well-educated and trained citizenry is invaluable.

In justice to the young men and women who are required to interrupt their private lives and to be exposed to risk for the defense of the Nation, I urge the renewal of this minimal program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 930) to extend educational benefits now provided for Korean conflict veterans to persons serving in the Armed Forces after January 31, 1955, and before the termination of compulsory military service under existing laws of the United States, introduced by Mr. HENNINGS (for himself and Mr. GREEN), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

INCREASED AMOUNT OF EARNINGS BY CERTAIN VETERANS WITHOUT LOSS OF PENSION

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill which increases the maximum annual earnings limit permitted under title 38 of the United States Code, otherwise known as the veterans compensation and pensions laws. In effect, this bill doubles the amount of money a disabled veteran is permitted to earn in gainful employment without the forfeiture or loss of his pension rights.

By reason of the general wage and living cost spiral, the maximum annual earnings limits have become antiquated and unrealistic and in all fairness and equity should be subjected to remedial legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 933) to increase the annual amount which certain veterans are permitted to earn without being deprived of the receipt of their pensions, introduced by Mr. CAPEHART, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

INCLUSION OF WHOLESALE DISTRIBUTORS OF GASOLINE WITHIN DEFINITION OF "PRODUCER," FOR EXCISE TAX PURPOSES

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill which will amend sections 4081(a) and 4082 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, relating to the definitions of purposes of the gasoline tax, which in effect will shift the direct imposition of such tax from the producer or blender of the gasoline to the level of the wholesaler.

In many cases, small gasoline producers and blenders are required under the present provisions of the code to assume and pay the gasoline tax at the time of initial sale to the wholesaler, the tax being computed upon the basis of original gallonage.

However, between the producer and wholesaler there is by reason of the volatile nature of the product a certain amount of evaporation in addition to normal spillage, and so forth.

The circumstances of the trade are in certain particulars similar to existing conditions in the brewing industry which were discussed at length on the floor of the Senate last year. It has been argued with at least some degree of merit that the imposition of a tax upon any perishable commodity in its original form and volume, which tax is then passed on to a wholesaler, retailer or consumer, who in effect receives something less than the original form or volume of such commodity, is an unfair and inequitable tax, the imposition of which would amount to an invasion or deprivation under the due process clause of the 14th amendment.

It is apparent that a producer who also had retail outlets would not be required under the code to compute and pay the tax until the time of "sale," i.e., the time of transfer from the retailer to the consumer; and accordingly would be afforded a competitive advantage over a producer or blender who had no retail outlets, but was required to compute and pay the tax at the time of "sale" to a wholesaler or jobber.

In fairness and justice I ask the Senate to correct this inequitable condition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 934) to include wholesale distributors of gasoline within the definition of "producer" for purposes of the excise tax on gasoline, introduced by Mr. CAPEHART, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT, RELATING TO REDUCTION OF TIME OF WAITING TO RECEIVE DISABILITY INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill which would amend title II of the Social Security Act to reduce from 6 to 3 months the period during which disabled persons must wait before becoming entitled to disability insurance benefits under such title.

I am reliably informed that as much as 8 to 10 months are often consumed between application for benefits and actual receipt of payments, all of which subjects an applicant in most cases to extreme hardships.

It is my understanding that the intention of Congress under the present law was to require a reasonable waiting period in order to satisfactorily determine the applicant's permanency of status. In practice, however, it has been adequately shown that the inequitable and unfair aspects of this so-called waiting period can be partially obviated without any unreasonable sacrifice or loss and in the best interests of the Government. Accordingly this bill would reduce to one-half the minimum time now required before consideration and adjudication of such claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 935) to amend title II of the Social Security Act to reduce from 6 to 3 months the period during which disabled persons must wait before becoming entitled to disability insurance benefits under such title, introduced by Mr. CAPEHART, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

AVAILABILITY OF FEDERAL FUNDS TO CERTAIN ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to expand the coverage of the Hill-Burton Act so as to make Federal funds available to mental health centers and clinics which are operated on a nonprofit basis and receive funds from a State or a political subdivision of a State.

I introduced this bill in both the 84th and 85th Congresses; but, due to overriding social circumstances, committee consideration of this measure was deferred. It is my hope that the atmosphere has now cleared, and that during the 86th Congress a thorough study will be made of this proposal.

All of us are aware of the significant strides which over the past decade have been made by the medical sciences with reference to mental health. However, it does little good merely to obtain greater knowledge and understanding of the varying mental health problems, if we do not have adequate clinical facilities to properly treat mental illness. In my home State of South Dakota, several forward-looking communities have been striving arduously to establish effective mental-health programs, but they are constantly confronted with the problem of insufficient funds to erect adequate physical facilities to properly care for the mental-health problems in their locale. An extension of the Hill-Burton provisions seems to me the best way to make Federal funds available for these worthy projects. I hope the committee will give early attention to this proposal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 936) to amend title VI of the Public Health Service Act, as amended, in order to make certain nonprofit corporations and associations eligible for Federal aid under such title, introduced by Mr. MUNDT, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

AMENDMENT OF PUBLIC ASSISTANCE PROVISIONS OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators PASTORE, MAGNUSON, LANGER, and CHAVEZ, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the public assistance provisions of the Social Security Act to eliminate certain inequities and restrictions and permit a more effective distribution of Federal funds.

The purpose of this measure is well summarized in the statement of policy, which reads as follows:

> It is the purpose of this act to provide more effectively for the protection, care, and assistance of the people of the United States who are in need thereof, and to promote the welfare and happiness of the people of the United States by providing public assistance to its needy and distressed. * * *

In my judgment, the true test of the good society is not measured in terms of economic output or gross national product, but rather in how it treats its aged, its poor, and its distressed citizens.

In our preoccupation with material possessions, new and ever brighter gadgets, and longer and more powerful motorcars, we too often simply close our eyes to the less fortunate members of our society who are dependent upon public assistance in order to live.

We have a great moral obligation to the needy aged, the blind, the physically handicapped, and the dependent children. In a society as rich as ours there is no justification for such people being denied their human dignity. Yet, the fact of the matter is that in all too many States, our public assistance programs are being administered in such a manner as to strip from these recipients their right as an American citizen to be treated with respect and dignity.

Two years ago the gentleman from California, Representative JAMES ROOSEVELT, and I had drafted a bill designed to humanize our public assistance program. This bill (S. 1793), entitled the "Humanitarian and Old-Age Rights Act," was offered in the Senate by myself and other colleagues, and in the House of Representatives by the gentleman from California, Representative ROOSEVELT, as H.R. 6611.

The letters which I received in support of this bill from all parts of the country were most heart rending. They were not written on expensive stationery with fancy letterheads. They were on common ordinary paper, in all varieties of handwriting, and obviously written from the heart. These letters, Mr. President, confirmed my belief that legislation is in order to establish higher and more uniform standards of public assistance.

The bill which I introduce today is identical to the above-mentioned bill I offered in the 85th Congress. A companion bill (H.R. 423) has been introduced in the House by Representative ROOSEVELT.

Briefly, I would like to outline provisions of the bill.

First, it would make the age requirement for old-age assistance recipients the same as that established for old-age beneficiaries under title II of the Social Security Act.

The need for this is obvious when we consider the low minimum benefits now paid under the OASI program. Many beneficiaries who fall into the low category cannot, naturally, live on a benefit payment of $50 or $60 per month, and must therefore apply for public assistance to supplement this inadequate income.

Therefore, when we lowered the age for women OASI beneficiaries to 62 as we did in 1956, and did not make a corresponding change in the public assistance program, many people were bound to be caught in the squeeze and our original purpose defeated to a large extent.

Secondly, we would allow the aged and handicapped on public assistance to earn up to $50 per month; the parents of needy children up to $30 per month; and the needy children, themselves, up to $30 per month to supplement their assistance checks. The blind are already permitted to earn $50 without penalty of reduction in aid.

This privilege was extended to the aged by this body in 1956, but, unfortunately, it was knocked out of the social security amendments by the conference committee.

Our bill would allow recipients to own a home of an assessed value, less all encumbrances, up to $5,000 free from the imposition of a lien. To me, the practice of forcing an old person to sign over the little home that he has spent most of his life acquiring, as a condition of receiving aid in time of need, is abominable.

We would exempt household furnishings and other personal effects plus an insurance policy or burial arrangement up to $500 in value, when considering need, and we would also establish a floor of $1,200 under the amount of personal property which a single recipient is allowed to have.

Mr. President, I see no earthly reason why we should require people to be absolute paupers before we consider them in need of help to obtain the day-to-day necessities of life. To force them to use up every last resource before they are given aid is to strip them of any feeling of security should they become ill, or should their checks be held up in the skein of red tape or for other reasons. If they have been thrifty enough to purchase a burial policy so that their last remains can be covered with a semblance of dignity, are we to force them to cash this in, thereby finally sentencing them to potter's field?

Mr. President, is it right to grind them right down into the dust of absolute poverty before they can expect any help?

Mr. President, we would further prohibit the practice of some States whereby the public-assistance laws are used to enforce the general-support laws of the State. This is the so-called responsible relatives law where children of pensioners are subjected to continual harassment by State and county administrators even though they are in no way financially capable of supporting their aged parents.

While I firmly subscribe to the theory that it is the moral responsibility of children to care for their parents if they can reasonably afford to do so, I feel that this should be a matter for State support laws, and not be used merely as a harassment in the public-assistance program.

To show the hardship this so often works on our oldsters, in some States the mere existence of a relative deemed capable of supporting the old person is reason enough—according to State law—for denying that old person aid. Whether or not the relative is actually supporting the needy person is not taken into consideration. The fact that the relative exists is enough.

As another consideration, Mr. President, our bill provides that the program is to be administered by each State so as to insure uniform treatment of the needy in all its political subdivisions.

We would further reinstate the original policy adopted by Congress that the names of recipients be held confidential.

That is, we would outlaw the "shame list," which is used by all too many States to ridicule recipients of aid. This law reminds me of the old practice of putting town drunks or wife beaters in stocks in the public square to shame them in front of fellow townsmen. We hardly think that such a theory has any place in the 20th century.

We come now to the question of the residence requirement imposed by a majority of our States. The Public Assistance Act says that a State shall not impose a residence requirement exceeding 5 years out of the 9 years preceding application. And many States impose this maximum.

Even on the surface, this whole idea of a residence requirement seems ridiculous and even downright un-American to me. Though I come from the great State of Minnesota, I am also an American citizen. I am not restricted to living in Minnesota. When I come to Washington, it is not necessary that I take out a visa to remain or that I obtain a passport to travel to California if I choose to do so. I am just as much an American citizen in California or Nebraska as I am in Minnesota.

To partially alleviate this problem, our bill reduces the State-imposed residence requirements now allowed by the Federal Government from 5 years to 1 year, and provides that should an otherwise qualified person not meet State residence requirements, the Federal Government will pay its share direct to the person until they have met the State residence requirement.

Finally, Mr. President, this bill provides that no person receiving such public aid shall be deemed a pauper and no warrant drawn in payment shall contain any reference to indigency or pauperism, and that the value of any United States surplus food made available will not be deducted from the recipient's aid.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill I am sending to the desk be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 937) to amend the public assistance provisions of the Social Security Act to eliminate certain inequities and restrictions and permit a more effective distribution of Federal funds, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Humanitarian and Old-Age Rights Act".

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE AND POLICY

SEC. 2. It is the purpose of this Act to provide more effectively for the protection, care, and assistance of the people of the United States who are in need thereof, and to promote the welfare and happiness of the people of the United States by providing public assistance to its needy and distressed. It is the policy of the Congress that assistance under titles I, IV, X, and XIV of the Social Security Act, as amended by this Act, shall be administered promptly and humanely, with due regard for the preservation of family life and without discrimination on account of race, religion, or political affiliation, and that such assistance shall be so administered as to encourage self-respect, self-reliance, and the desire to be a good citizen, useful to society. Titles I, IV, X, and XIV of the Social Security Act shall be liberally construed in order to carry out this purpose and policy.

OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE

SEC. 3. (a) (1) (A) Section 2(a)(1) of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows: "(1) provide that it shall be in effect in all political subdivisions of the State;".

(B) Section 2(a)(3) of such Act is amended to read as follows: "(3) provide for the establishment or designation of a single State agency to administer the plan;".

(2) Section 2(a)(7) of such Act is amended to read as follows: "(7) provide that the State agency shall, in determining need, take into consideration any other income and resources of an individual claiming old-age assistance; except that, in making such determination, the State agency shall disregard (A) the first $50 per month of earned income, (B) the ownership by such individual (alone or with his or her spouse) of a home having an assessed value, less all encumbrances of record thereon, of less than $5,000 (except to the extent that he is receiving rental income therefrom), (C) the ability of such individual's family and relatives to provide for his support, (D) any donations of surplus food which may have been made to such individual from stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation, and (E) the first $1,200 in value (over and above all encumbrances of record) of personal property owned by such individual;"

(3) Section 2(a) of such Act is further amended by striking out the final period and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the following: "and (12) provide that there will be no discrimination based on sex in determining the needs of individuals receiving assistance under the plan."

(4) Section 2 (a) of such Act is further amended by adding after clause (12) the following new sentence: "For purposes of clause (7)(E), no life insurance policy shall be valued at more than its present surrender value to the individual, and the term 'personal property' shall not include (i) the individual's clothing, furniture, household equipment, foodstuffs, fuel, personal jewelry, or other personal effects, or (ii) interment plots, money placed in trust or insurance for funeral, interment, or similar expenses, or any contract rights connected therewith, if such money, insurance, or contract rights do not exceed $500 in value."

(5) Section 2(b)(1) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(1) An age requirement at any given time of more than the age which at such time constitutes retirement age for purposes of title II of this Act; or".

(6) Section 2(b)(2) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(2) Any residence requirement which excludes any resident of the State who has resided therein continuously for one year immediately preceding the application; or".

(b) The second sentence of section 1 of such Act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a semicolon and the following: "but no payment shall be made under this title to any State which has not also submitted, and had approved by the Secretary, State plans for assistance under titles IV, X, and XIV".

(c) Section 4 of such Act is amended by striking out "or" at the end of paragraph (1), by adding "or" at the end of paragraph (2), and by inserting after paragraph (2) the following new paragraph:

"(3) that in the administration of the plan there is imposed, as a condition of old-age assistance to any individual, a requirement that such individual subject his home to a lien of any kind or transfer to the State agency any interest in his home;".

(d) Title I of such act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"Direct Payments to Individuals Not Satisfying Residence Requirements

"SEC. 7. If an individual, after making application for old-age assistance, is denied such assistance by the State agency solely because he does not satisfy the residence requirements imposed under the State plan, and if such individual is not entitled to old-age assistance by reason of prior residence in another State, the State agency shall promptly notify the Secretary of the fact that such individual has made such application and would be eligible for old-age assistance if he satisfied such requirements. The Secretary shall thereupon pay directly to such individual for each month, beginning with the first month (after the month of such individual's application) in which such individual would have been eligible for old-age assistance if he satisfied such residence requirements and ending with the month preceding the first month in which he satisfies such requirements, an amount (as determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary) equal to the Federal Government's proportionate share of the old-age assistance which such individual would receive for such month if he then satisfied such requirements.

"Assistance for Needs of Recipient Only

"SEC. 8. Assistance paid to any individual under this title is to assist him in meeting his individual needs and is not for the benefit of any other person; and such assistance shall not be regarded as income of any person other than such individual."

AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN

SEC. 4. (a)(1)(A) Section 402(a)(1) of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows: "(1) provide that it shall be in effect in all political subdivisions of the State;".

(B) Section 402(a)(3) of such Act is amended to read as follows: "(3) provide for the establishment or designation of a single State agency to administer the plan;".

(2) Section 402(a)(7) of such Act is amended to read as follows: "(7) provide that the State agency shall, in determining need, take into consideration any other income and resources of any child claiming aid to dependent children; except that in making such determination the State agency shall disregard (A) the first $15 per month of income earned by such child and the first $30 per month of income earned by his parent or guardian, (B) the ownership by such child (or by his parent or guardian) of a home having an assessed value, less all encumbrances of record thereon, of less than $5,000 (except to the extent that he is receiving rental income therefrom), and (C) any donations of surplus food which may have been made to or for such child from stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation;".

(3) Section 402(a) of such Act is further amended by striking out the final period and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word "and", and by adding at the end of the subsection the following new clause: "(13) provide that there will be no discrimination based on sex in determining the needs of individuals receiving assistance under the plan."

(b) The second sentence of section 401 of such Act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a semicolon and the following: "but no payment shall be made under this title to any State which has not also submitted, and had approved by the Secretary, State plans for assistance under titles I, X, and XIV".

(c) Section 404 of such Act is amended by striking out "or" at the end of paragraph (1), by adding "or" at the end of paragraph (2), and by inserting after paragraph (2) the following new paragraph:

"(3) that in the administration of the plan there is imposed, as a condition of aid to any dependent child, a requirement that such child (or his parent or guardian) subject to his (or their) home to a lien of any kind or transfer to the State agency any interest in such home;".

(d) Title IV of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"Direct Payments to Dependent Children Not Satisfying Residence Requirements

"SEC. 407. If a dependent child, after making application for aid to dependent children, is denied such aid by the State agency solely because he does not satisfy the residence requirements imposed under the State plan, and if such child is not entitled to aid to dependent children by reason of prior residence in another State, the State agency shall promptly notify the Secretary of the fact that such child has made such application and would be eligible for such aid if he satisfied such requirements. The Secretary shall thereupon pay directly to such child for each month, beginning with the first month (after the month of such child's application) in which such child would have been eligible for aid to dependent children if he satisfied such residence requirements and ending with the month preceding the first month in which he satisfies such requirements, an amount (as determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary) equal to the Federal Government's proportionate share of the aid to dependent children which such child would receive for such month if he then satisfied such requirements."

AID TO THE BLIND

SEC. 5. (a)(1)(A) Section 1002(a)(1) of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows: "(1) provide that it shall be in effect in all political subdivisions of the State;".

(B) Section 1002(a)(3) of such Act is amended to read as follows: "(3) provide for the establishment or designation of a single State agency to administer the plan;".

(2) Section 1002(a)(8) of such Act is amended to read as follows: "(8) provide that the State agency shall, in determining need, take into consideration any other income and resources of an individual claiming aid to the blind; except that, in making such determination, the State agency shall disregard (A) the first $50 per month of earned income, (B) the ownership by such individual (alone or with his or her spouse) of a home having an assessed value, less all encumbrances of record thereon, of less than $5,000 (except to the extent that he is receiving rental income therefrom), (C) the ability of such individual's family and relatives to provide for his support, (D) any donations of surplus food which may have been made to such individual from stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation, and (E) the first $1,200 in value (over and above all encumbrances of record) of personal property owned by such individual;".

(3) Section 1002 (a) of such Act is further amended by striking out the final period and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the following: "and (14) provide that there will be no discrimination based on sex in determining the needs of individuals receiving assistance under the plan."

(4) Section 1002 (a) of such Act is further amended by adding after clause (14) the following new sentence: "For purposes of clause (8) (E), no life insurance policy shall be valued at more than its present surrender value to the individual, and the term 'personal property' shall not include (i) the individual's clothing, furniture, household equipment, foodstuffs, fuel, personal jewelry, or other personal effects, or (ii) interment plots, money placed in trust or insurance for funeral, interment, or similar expenses, or any contract rights connected therewith, if such money, insurance, or contract rights do not exceed $500 in value."

(5) Section 1002 (b) (1) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(1) Any residence requirement which excludes any resident of the State who has resided therein continuously for one year immediately preceding the application; or".

(b) The second sentence of section 1001 of such Act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a semicolon and the following: "but no payment shall be made under this title to any State which has not also submitted, and had approved by the Secretary, State plans for assistance under titles I, IV, and XIV".

(c) Section 1004 of such Act is amended by striking out "or" at the end of paragraph (1), by adding "or" at the end of paragraph (2), and by inserting after paragraph (2) the following new paragraph:

"(3) that in the administration of the plan there is imposed, as a condition of aid to any individual, a requirement that such individual subject his home to a lien of any kind or transfer to the State agency any interest in his home;".

(d) Title X of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"Direct Payments to Individuals Not Satisfying Residence Requirements

"SEC. 1007. If an individual, after making application for aid to the blind, is denied such aid by the State agency solely because he does not satisfy the residence requirements imposed under the State plan, and if such individual is not entitled to aid to the blind by reason of prior residence in another State, the State agency shall promptly notify the Secretary of the fact that such individual has made such application and would be eligible for such aid if he satisfied such requirements. The Secretary shall thereupon pay directly to such individual for each month, beginning with the first month (after the month of such individual's application) in which such individual would have been eligible for aid to the blind if he satisfied such residence requirements and ending with the month preceding the first month in which he satisfies such requirements, an amount (as determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary) equal to the Federal Government's proportionate share of the aid to the blind which such individual would receive for such month if he then satisfied such requirements.

"Assistance for Needs of Recipient Only

"SEC. 1008. Assistance paid to any individual under this title is to assist him in meeting his individual needs and is not for the benefit of any other person; and such assistance shall not be regarded as income of any person other than such individual."

AID TO THE PERMANENTLY AND TOTALLY DISABLED

SEC. 6. (a)(1)(A) Section 1402(a)(1) of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows: "(1) provide that it shall be in effect in all political subdivisions of the State;".

(B) Section 1402(a)(3) of such Act is amended to read as follows: "(3) provide for the establishment or designation of a single State agency to administer the plan;".

(2) Section 1402(a)(8) of such Act is amended to read as follows: "(8) provide that the State agency shall, in determining need, take into consideration any other income and resources of an individual claiming aid to the permanently and totally disabled; except that, in making such determination, the State agency shall disregard (A) the first $50 per month of earned income, (B) the ownership by such individual (alone or with his or her spouse) of a home having an assessed value, less all encumbrances of record thereon, of less than $5,000 (except to the extent that he is receiving rental income therefrom), (C) the ability of such individual's family and relatives to provide for his support, (D) any donations of surplus food which may have been made to such individual from stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation, and (E) the first $1,200 in value (over and above all encumbrances of record) of personal property owned by such individual;".

(3) Section 1402(a) of such Act is further amended by striking out the final period and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the following: "and (13) provide that there will be no discrimination based on sex in determining the needs of individuals receiving assistance under the plan."

(4) Section 1402(a) of such Act is further amended by adding after clause (13) the following new sentence: "For purposes of clause (8)(E), no life insurance policy shall be valued at more than its present surrender value to the individual, and the term 'personal property' shall not include (i) the individual's clothing, furniture, household equipment, foodstuffs, fuel, personal jewelry, or other personal effects, or (ii) interment plots, money placed in trust or insurance for funeral, interment, or similar expenses, or any contract rights connected therewith, if such money, insurance, or contract rights do not exceed $500 in value."

(5) Section 1402(b)(1) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(1) Any residence requirement which excludes any resident of the State who has resided therein continuously for one year immediately preceding the application; or".

(b) The second sentence of section 1401 of such Act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a semicolon and the following: "but no payment shall be made under this title to any State which has not also submitted, and had approved by the Secretary, State plans for assistance under titles I, IV, and X".

(c) Section 1404 of such Act is amended by striking out "or" at the end of paragraph (1), by adding "or" at the end of paragraph (2), and by inserting after paragraph (2) the following new paragraph:

"(3) that in the administration of the plan there is imposed, as a condition of aid to any individual, a requirement that such individual subject his home to a lien of any kind or transfer to the State agency any interest in his home;".

(d) Title XIV of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"Direct Payments to Individuals Not Satisfying Residence Requirements

"SEC. 1406. If an individual, after making application for aid to the permanently and totally disabled, is denied such aid by the State agency solely because he does not satisfy the residence requirements imposed under the State plan, and if such individual is not entitled to aid to the permanently and totally disabled by reason of prior residence in another State, the State agency shall promptly notify the Secretary of the fact that such individual has made such application and would be eligible for such aid if he satisfied such requirements. The Secretary shall thereupon pay directly to such individual for each month, beginning with the first month (after the month of such individual's application) in which such individual would have been eligible for aid to the permanently and totally disabled if he satisfied such residence requirements and ending with the month preceding the first month in which he satisfies such requirements, an amount (as determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary) equal to the Federal Government's proportionate share of the aid to the permanently and totally disabled which such individual would receive for such month if he then satisfied such requirements.

"Assistance for Needs of Recipient Only

"SEC. 1407. Assistance paid to any individual under this title is to assist him in meeting his individual needs and is not for the benefit of any other person; and such assistance shall not be regarded as income of any person other than such individual."

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 7. (a) As used in the provisions of the Social Security Act amended by this Act, the term "Secretary", except when the context otherwise requires, means the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.

(b) Section 618 of the Revenue Act of 1951 (relating to public access to State public assistance records) is repealed.

(c) No check or warrant drawn in payment of assistance to any individual under title I, IV, X, or XIV of the Social Security Act, and no envelope or other outer covering therefor, shall bear any printing or marking which indicates or implies that such individual is indigent or a pauper.

(d) The amendments made by sections 3(d), 4(d), 5(d), and 6(d) shall apply with respect to months beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act. Section 7(b) shall apply with respect to payments to which the States (including the agencies and political subdivisions thereof) become entitled after the date of the enactment of this Act. Sections 7(a) and 7(c) shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act. The remaining amendments made by this Act shall take effect on July 1, 1960.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has been requested by the Vice President to announce for him the following appointments:

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

The designation, pursuant to the resolution of the Senate of January 24, 1901, of Mr. ALLOTT, a Senator from the State of Colorado, to read Washington's Farewell Address to the Senate on Monday, February 23, next.

SENATE OFFICE BUILDING COMMISSION

The appointment of Mr. ALLOTT and Mr. COOPER to be members of the Senate Office Building Commission, created by the act of April 28, 1904, as amended, vice former Senators Malone, of Nevada, and Purtell, of Connecticut.

MEMBER OF BOARD OF VISITORS TO UNITED STATES MERCHANT MARINE ACADEMY

The appointment of Mr. COTTON to be a member of the Board of Visitors to the United States Merchant Marine Academy, pursuant to title 46, United States Code, section 1126c.

MEMBER OF BOARD OF VISITORS TO UNITED STATES COAST GUARD ACADEMY

The appointment of Mr. BUSH to be a member of the Board of Visitors to the United States Coast Guard Academy, pursuant to title 14, United States Code, section 15h.

APPOINTMENT OF MINORITY MEMBERS OF JOINT ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has been requested by the Vice President to announce for him the appointment, pursuant to section 5(a) of Public Law 304, 79th Congress, the appointment of Mr. BUSH, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. JAVITS as members on the part of the Senate of the Joint Economic Committee, to fill existing vacancies thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, at the request of the Vice President, announces for him the appointment of Mr. CAPEHART as a member of the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, to fill the vacancy caused by the retirement from the Senate of Hon. Irving M. Ives, of New York.

PROHIBITION OF FEES TO VIEW TELECASTS IN PRIVATE HOMES—BILLS INTRODUCED BY SENATOR LANGER

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, on January 20 I introduced some bills on behalf of my distinguished friend the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] and I asked that the bills be considered as having been introduced by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota himself. Evidently I did not make myself clear, and the bills are shown as introduced under my sponsorship with the distinguished Senator from North Dakota listed as a cosponsor.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the proper correction be made, so that the bills, S. 591 and S. 592, will be shown as having been introduced by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] and will not include my sponsorship.

I observe the Parliamentarian is shaking his head, Mr. President. I made such a unanimous-consent request previously. I thought it was within the rule, and I heard no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Parliamentarian advises the Chair that the RECORD shows the bills were not introduced under the sponsorship of the Senator from Illinois but by the distinguished Senator for the Senator from North Dakota.

Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none; and, without objection, proper corrections will be made.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The bills should be printed as having been introduced by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, and my name should not appear on the bills as a cosponsor. I hope that is made clear, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the request is agreed to.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Illinois for what he did for me when I could not be present. I want to assure the Senator that both bills are excellent bills and I am sorry he is not a cosponsor of them.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I received all the credit and my distinguished friend received all the blame.

HOUSING ACT OF 1959—AMENDMENTS

Mr. HART (for himself and Mr. MCNAMARA) submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (S. 57) to extend and amend laws relating to the provision and improvement of housing and the renewal of urban communities, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota (for himself and Mr. LANGER) submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to Senate bill 57, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. MONRONEY (for himself, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. MCNAMARA, Mr. HART, Mr. GORE, Mr. YARBOROUGH, Mr. KERR, Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. LONG, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. GRUENING, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. MORSE, Mr. KEFAUVER, and Mr. LANGER) submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to Senate bill 57, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. MORSE submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to Senate bill 57, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PRINTING OF REVIEW ON REPORTS ON THE GULF INTRACOASTAL WATERWAY CHANNEL TO PORT MANSFIELD, TEX.—(S. DOC. NO. 11)

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I call this matter to the attention of the majority leader.

Mr. President, I present a letter from the Secretary of the Army, transmitting a report dated September 19, 1958, from the Chief of Engineers, Department of the Army, together with accompanying papers and illustrations, on a review of reports on the Gulf Intracoastal Waterway, channel to Port Mansfield, Tex., requested by resolution of the Committee on Public Works, adopted June 17, 1949. I ask unanimous consent that the report be printed as a Senate document, with illustrations, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I express my appreciation to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEASE AND TRANSFER OF ACREAGE ALLOTMENTS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, on January 9, 1959, I introduced the bill (S. 58) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, to provide for lease and transfer of acreage allotments. I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] may be added as a cosponsor of the bill when it is next printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HEALTH SERVICES STUDY COMMISSION—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF JOINT RESOLUTION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] may be added as one of the cosponsors of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 43) to establish the Health Services Study Commission, introduced by me on February 3, 1959.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF RESOLUTION

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at such time as Senate Resolution 19, establishing a standing Committee on Veterans' Affairs in the Senate, is reprinted, the name of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL] may be included as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. TALMADGE:

Remarks by Representative VAN ZANDT in presenting to Senator RUSSELL the annual Minute Man of the Year Award of the Reserve Officers Association of the United States.

Address delivered by him at the 29th annual convention of the American Coalition of Patriotic Societies, at Washington, D.C., on February 3, 1959.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION OF PHILIP K. CROWE TO BE AMBASSADOR EXTRAORDINARY AND PLENIPOTENTIARY TO UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to announce that the Senate received today from the President of the United States the nominations of Philip K. Crowe, of Maryland, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Union of South Africa, and Raymond A. Hare, of West Virginia, now Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to the United Arab Republic, to serve concurrently and without additional compensation as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Kingdom of Yemen.

Notice is given that the Committee on Foreign Relations, at the expiration of 6 days, in accordance with the committee rule, will give consideration to these nominations.

ADDRESSES BY JOHN M. MAHAN AND SENATOR JOHNSON OF TEXAS AT THE VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS CONGRESSIONAL DINNER, 1959

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, last evening the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States held their annual banquet for the Members of the Congress of the United States. On that occasion, almost 500 Members of the Congress—the largest number ever present at such an event—were present to do honor to the national commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, John W. Mahan, of Helena, Mont.; to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, Gen. Randolph McC. Pate; and to our distinguished majority leader, the senior Senator from Texas, LYNDON B. JOHNSON, who was the recipient of the distinguished service award given by that organization annually.

It was an inspiring occasion. The speeches were well delivered. The time consumed was less than 2 hours. Every State was given recognition; and, in effect, a most interesting time was had by all in attendance. It was an occasion reflecting great credit on the VFW with its 1,300,000 members and on its outstanding commander in chief, our fellow Montanan, John W. Mahan. We were proud of him and all our other friends from our State who were present.

But while everyone there enjoyed himself, there was of course a seriousness about the occasion which brought home to all those present the difficulties under which we live at the present time.

The full Montana congressional delegation, headed by our distinguished senior Senator, Mr. MURRAY, was in attendance. In addition, there were approximately 50 members of the VFW from Montana headed by our State Commander Dale Pawlowski, of Circle, Mont.

An inspiring address was delivered by my fellow Montanan, the national commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, John W. Mahan, in the introduction of the guest of honor, the distinguished majority leader, the Honorable LYNDON W. JOHNSON, the senior Senator from Texas.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the address delivered by Mr. Mahan and the address delivery by the distinguished majority leader in reply be incorporated in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY JOHN W. MAHAN INTRODUCING THE HONORABLE LYNDON B. JOHNSON, VFW CONGRESSIONAL DINNER 1959

Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. Speaker, General Pate, over 125 years ago the great American migration west was just getting under way. Pioneers, frontiersmen, adventurers boldly set forth to tame the land from Texas to Oregon and to make it part of America. These men carried with them a desire to explore, to build, to find a new life for themselves regardless of the danger and hardship. They found that new life and the greatness of America was assured.

Today, fortunately for the Nation and for free men everywhere, men from the West—with this same toughness of spirit, idealism—ever restless to meet new challenges, to explore new frontiers—are coming back from whence their ancestors came—because here on the Potomac lie the challenges and the frontiers of the 20th century—the frontiers of freedom, of dignity, of worlds beyonds ours—of space.

Foremost among these men is our guest of honor. He began his career in Government 22 years ago. Elected to Congress in 1938, he interrupted this career the day after Pearl Harbor and was the first Member of Congress to don a uniform. As a lieutenant commander in the Naval Reserve, he served with distinction in the combat areas of the South Pacific. While there he volunteered for a hazardous combat mission to obtain vital intelligence over hostile New Guinea. For this action he was personally decorated with the Silver Star by Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

He has advanced in 10 years to a man of great national and international prominence in serving our country as its spokesman in the United Nations—to bring about the peaceful uses of outer space. He is chairman of the Senate Aeronautical and Space Sciences Committee, chairman of the Preparedness Subcommittee of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and member of the Appropriations Committee.

Perhaps in the last analysis the real mark of a man is what his fellow men think of him. This man has become almost a legend in less than 10 years. He was elected to the Senate in 1948. He was elected by his fellow Senators as leader of his party in the Senate only 4 years later—a post he has occupied ever since. This is the judgment of his peers—the men who know him best. And what of his friends—the ones who know him as a person—not only as the efficient, skillful leader of the Senate? To them, he is a warm and friendly neighbor—gracious, generous, and sentimental—a friend who is there when needed.

This is a man. And men is what this Nation needs in the midtwentieth century. As a westerner, I am proud he is from the West. As commander in chief of the VFW, I am proud that he is a member of our organization. As an American, I am both proud and grateful that he occupies a position of high leadership of the Nation in these anxious times.

It is a high honor to present to you a man from the West who brings to the present the pioneer spirit of the past, a man who brings to free men everywhere hope for the future, the distinguished Senator from Texas. I am happy to present the highest award which the 1,300,000 members of the VFW can bestow on any man, the gold citizenship award to the Honorable LYNDON B. JOHNSON.

FOR THE COMMON DEFENSE

(Address by Senate Democratic Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON, of Texas, Veterans of Foreign Wars dinner, Washington, D.C., Feb. 3, 1959)

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, for this award—and for the honor of this occasion—I am most grateful to you. While your recognition is to my public service, this moment is one of deep personal meaning to me.

I accept this award in the sense of a representative of the millions of Americans who have joined in a partnership to provide for the common defense.

This includes those who faced the enemy in combat.

This includes those who have produced the tools of preparedness.

THE THOUGHT OF PREPAREDNESS

This includes those who, like the Veterans of Foreign Wars, have banded together to keep alive the thought of preparedness in the hearts of our citizens.

The VFW is not just an organization founded upon memories of events which become nostalgic as we get farther from them. It is a vital force upon the American scene today.

For 22 years now—as a Member of the House and as a Member of the Senate—I have served in the Congress. Throughout that period I have served continuously on those committees charged with the most direct responsibility for our national security.

DECISION AND RESPONSIBILITY

National security—in these times—is complex. National strength is costly.

The burdens of decision and responsibility are trials.

But when these matters are approached in terms of individual human lives, the complexities become simple, the cost becomes cheap, and the trials cease to matter.

The question today has not changed since 1942.

Can free men ask their sons to defend freedom with less than the best of weapons or less than the maximum of willing support wherever the line of battle may fall?

For myself—and, I am sure, for you—I say that the answer is forthright and simple, "No."

NO AREA OF COMPROMISE

On this, there is no area of compromise. There is no alternative. There are no choices. Either this is to be our standard and the purpose of our efforts, or it is not.

In terms of principle it is simple. It is not simple in terms of application. Twenty years ago—when we were beginning to mobilize for World War II—we used what weapons were needed to protect our freedom. Where we did not have those weapons on hand, we could afford to make substitutions.

We handed our sons broom handles with signs attached to identify them as guns. We posted signs on old trucks and called them tanks. We simulated artillery with water pipes.

SUBSTITUTES FOR THE REAL THING

Those weapons that mattered so much to us in 1940 are basically obsolete, and even the broom handles are obsolete.

The demands of national security—and the change of our national position—no longer permit us the leisure of outfitting ourselves with substitutes for the real thing.

This is the first—and the greatest—single change in our concept of national security.

Time is no longer our friend. Time is no longer on our side.

Security is no longer a point at which we may hope to arrive 1 year, 2 years, or 10 years hence. Security—in the modern world—is a condition we must maintain each hour of each day.

This underscores another matter of great importance.

CHANGES IN MILITARY CONCEPTS

Twenty years ago—in our period of mobilization against the threat afforded by the Axis powers—you will recall the profound changes we were forced to undergo in our military concepts. At the beginning of mobilization, armored divisions and mechanized divisions were unheard of. Paratroops and dive-bombing and landing craft were unknown concepts. The most romantic branch of our services was the horse cavalry.

VICTORIES: THE PRODUCT OF CHANGE

Our victories in World War II were the product of changes we were forced to make in our thinking after the war in Europe had begun.

Today—and for so long as the Nation shall endure—we do not have, and will not have, the same margin of time.

THE EDGE OF CAPABILITY

For more than a decade, peace has been maintained because—as men such as Winston Churchill have pointed out—we of the United States have held a continuing edge in capabilities. What we often overlook is that American science gave us the lead in the nuclear age. This lead—won by the invention and creativeness of our minds—served the world as the greatest single deterrent to aggression. The fact that we had unquestioned leadership in this realm made it unnecessary to use atomic energy in any military form.

THE TIME OF DANGER

This demonstrates the point that needs making now. Our greatest time of danger in the world is at times of transition.

When we come to a phase in which old concepts are obsolete and new concepts are not yet perfected, there is where the danger lies.

SECURITY FOR THE FUTURE

If American science had not been the leader in bringing free men to the atomic age, the cost of national security these past 15 years would have been prohibitive beyond our imagination. The parallel challenge of the opportunities of space is identical.

The weapons of the past are obsolete. The strategies of the past are obsolete. Along with this transition, we must face another fact of change.

ONE GOAL FOR AMERICA

We are working now in the Senate on the job that is foremost for the members of the legislative branch—getting the facts. We must have those facts to discharge our duties. It is my hope, though, that out of this can come the search for a new way and a better way to bring together—rather than to keep apart—our joint pursuits of the same goal.

There is—and must be—only one goal for Americans:

To provide our Nation with security and, through that strength, to be leaders for peace.

A TIME OF GREAT POTENTIAL

We have come to a time of great potential. Never has there been so great an opportunity for us as that opening now. If we move with vigor into the leadership of space, we shall turn those wild fields into the meadows of peace. The opportunity to achieve a creative peace is the opportunity before us now, and the challenge to our lives, our talents, our will. With this before us, let us so work that it shall never be said again that we did too little, too late.

DULLES-FULBRIGHT ACCORD

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in the New York Herald Tribune of Tuesday, February 3, there appeared a story entitled "In Interests of Nation: Dulles-Fulbright Accord Sought," written by Rowland Evans, Jr.

I think this is a very worthwhile synopsis of a situation which exists, and which will continue to exist in the future so far as the relationship between the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the Secretary of State is concerned.

Let me say that, on the whole, that accord has been quite good. I anticipate that it will be just as good in the future, if not better.

In the article Mr. Evans refers not only to the Secretary of State and his possible relationship with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the new chairman, but he also refers to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], the Honorable C. Douglas Dillon, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, and the Assistant Secretary of State, William B. Macomber, who is the congressional liaison contact between the State Department and the Congress as a whole.

I join Mr. Evans in his high praise of Mr. Macomber's devotion to duty. Although this is a well-written story, there is one vital element missing. I am delighted, in respect to this, to observe the presence in the Chamber at this moment of members of the Committee on Foreign Relations—the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], and others, who will attest to the fact that last year the Foreign Relations Committee unanimously—and I believe at the instigation of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT]—voted to send a letter of commendation and thanks to Assistant Secretary Macomber for the fine attitude he displayed, for the good cooperation he had shown, and for his attention to duty and detail in keeping the committee informed of developments in the field of foreign policy and in its relations with the Department of State. To my knowledge, this is the first time that a letter of this kind had ever been sent to a man in Secretary Macomber's position and, in my opinion, it was richly deserved.

I ask unanimous consent that this story be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN INTERESTS OF NATION: DULLES-FULBRIGHT ACCORD SOUGHT

(By Rowland Evans, Jr.)

WASHINGTON, February 2.—A number of factors are operating quietly and persistently in the background to help resolve the public discord that, on occasion, has marred the relationship between Secretary of State John Foster Dulles and Senator J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT, Democrat, of Arkansas.

For obvious reasons, the national security will not be strengthened if the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and the Secretary of State are at each other's throat. Conversely, the interests of the Nation can be immeasurably advanced if the men who occupy these two pinnacles of power in the conduct of foreign relations can merge their talents and collaborate in finding solutions to the plaguing questions of the time.

CHAIRMAN KEY PERSON

A Foreign Relations chairman can, if he tries hard, wreck the best laid plans of an administration, as Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, grandfather of the present American Ambassador to the United Nations, wrecked President Wilson's League of Nations.

On the other hand, the chairman can virtually guarantee the acceptance of some pretty radical policies, if his support is fully engaged. For example, the late Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg underwrote the Marshall plan.

Senator FULBRIGHT, the newest chairman, is well aware of all this. So is Mr. Dulles, who has a good deal more at stake. Mr. Dulles needs the Senate more than the Senate needs him.

While the Secretary and the Senator work to reconcile their differences of method and technique and try to conduct their private negotiations out of the headlines, the hidden but immensely important apparatus of informal communication between the Senate and the State Department is now working overtime to make the job easier.

ROLE OF MACOMBER

Assistant Secretary of State William B. Macomber, the imaginative, highly skilled operator who has charge of congressional liaison and who is the principal implement of this apparatus, holds the complete confidence of Senator FULBRIGHT. Mr. Macomber has roots of his own in the Senate, where he once served as Senator JOHN SHERMAN COOPER'S administrative assistant. He also has a unique intimacy with Mr. Dulles, for whom he worked as confidential assistant before taking charge of congressional liaison.

The selection of Mr. Macomber was one of Mr. Dulles' wisest appointments. His job is to translate and interpret administration foreign policy for the Democratic Congress and interpret the congressional response for the administration. He works at this delicate job, with its inevitable byproduct of sensitivity feelings and wounded pride, as meticulously as a diamond cutter. His is a job of human relations wherein the element of face has extraordinary importance. Mr. Macomber has a talk with Senator FULBRIGHT almost every day. He recently held a breakfast in the State Department for 11 freshmen Senators, an unpublicized affair that could pay a dividend at some future time.

C. Douglas Dillon, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, is another key member of the apparatus of informal communication. Like many rich men with successful business backgrounds, he has the confidence of the powerful in Congress. Of all the Department's top officials, he is liked the best and trusted the most. His relationship with Senator FULBRIGHT is intimate. He is a natural bridge between Mr. Dulles and Senator FULBRIGHT, if any is needed.

AN ALLY OF DULLES

On the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Senator JOHN J. SPARKMAN is perhaps the strongest Democratic ally of Mr. Dulles. Senator SPARKMAN helped Mr. Dulles write the Japanese peace treaty and holds the Secretary in high regard. Elsewhere on the committee, Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY'S work in the disarmament field has brought him in close contact with Mr. Dulles and, perhaps surprisingly, the two have developed a strong mutual respect.

Also working to exploit the subsurface avenues of communication is Carl Marcy, the gifted chief of the committee's staff.

How the collective force of these personalities plays upon the two principals will depend on how the Secretary and the Senator work out their own disagreements—differences of technique rather than basic objectives. If their own lines of communication should start to clog, these are the figures in the background who will be in position to force them open.

In the meantime, regular and unpublicized conversations between the Secretary and the Senator are a certainty.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANSFIELD in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE PRESIDENT IN THE LABOR - MANAGEMENT FIELD—STATEMENT BY THE SECRETARY OF LABOR

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the distinguished Secretary of Labor is appearing this morning before the Senate Committee on Labor, to testify. I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the body of the RECORD the text of the statement the Secretary is making before that committee.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF JAMES P. MITCHELL, SECRETARY OF LABOR, BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON LABOR, SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE, FEBRUARY 4, 1959

I am pleased to be here once again to discuss with this committee the legislative recommendations of the President in the labor-management field. In his labor message of January 28, the President said that there is need for the enactment of effective legislation:

"To safeguard workers' funds in union treasuries against misuse of any kind whatsoever.

"To protect the rights and freedoms of individual union members, including the basic right to free and secret election of officers.

"To advance true and responsible collective bargaining.

"To protect the public and innocent third parties from unfair and coercive practices such as boycotting and blackmail picketing.

"To carry these principles into action, the President has submitted to the Congress a fair and just legislative program which is set out in S. 748. The main concern of the administration in developing this legislative program has been to protect individual rights of the men and women who work and the interests of the public in a manner which will aid rather than hinder the furtherance of the growth of legitimate trade unionism. It will deal effectively with the problem areas in labor-management relations which require legislative action. It bears upon employers as well as unions but does not place undue burdens upon either. It recognizes that the majority of labor and management officials are sincere and honest in their dealings one with the other and with the union members, and is directed to helping the legitimate trade union movement clean its own house and to assisting fair employers in curbing any improper practices on the management side."

I propose in this statement to explore the primary problem areas in labor-management relations which require, and which may be solved by, Federal legislative action, and I propose to show how the administration's bill, as a comprehensive approach, deals with these problems. The interim report of the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, chaired by Senator MCCLELLAN, set out nine conclusions which the committee had reached as the result of its investigations and which should be dealt with by Federal legislative action. Any legislative program in this field will be judged by the American people on the basis of how completely, effectively, and fairly it reaches these problem areas.

The administration's bill, I submit, will best meet this test. As the President stated in his message, it "will do so without imposing arbitrary restrictions or punitive measures on the legitimate activities of honest labor and management officials." It is important to remember that the great majority of those connected with labor and management fall in this category, and that the evils we are seeking to correct are as much anathema to them as they are to the American public as a whole.

The conclusions of the select committee were:

1. That there had been a "significant lack of democratic procedures in the unions studied."

2. That there had been an abuse of the power to place subordinate bodies under "supervisorship."

3. That "certain managements have extensively engaged in collusion with unions."

4. That there had been "widespread misuse of union funds in the unions studied."

5. That "violence in labor-management disputes * * * still exists."

6. That there had been management violations of the Taft-Hartley Act by use of labor spies, "spontaneous" employee committees, and other improper practices.

7. That "the weapon of organizational picketing has been abused" by its use without regard to the desires of the employees in question.

8. That "gangsters and hoodlums have successfully infiltrated some labor unions."

9. That there is an extensive "no man's land" in jurisdiction over labor-management relations.

Let us examine these conclusions in more detail and certain of the evidence which supports them and see how the administration's proposals would apply to them. In doing so, I should like to omit from my review of this evidence, where I can do so without misquotation, the names of the perpetrators of the abuses that have been shown to exist. To add once more to the notoriety of these persons would contribute nothing and might well detract from the emphasis which should be placed on the substance of the abuses in which they were involved and which we are proposing to correct.

1. The select committee found that there had been a significant lack of democratic procedures in the unions studied and that the use of the secret ballot had been denied in many cases.

The president of the Bakery and Confectionery Workers' International Union, which has since been expelled from the AFL–CIO, was found to be "an example of a labor autocrat who * * * conjures up few rivals." It was stated that in the 1956 union convention at San Francisco this man "railroaded through" changes in the union constitution which destroyed any remaining pretenses of union democracy. It was found that actions and statements by this officer "at the convention nakedly exposed an authoritarian philosophy abhorrent to legitimate American unionism. Under his callous direction use of the secret ballot to elect international officers was abandoned, thus further intimidating possible dissenters."

With respect to the Teamsters' Union, the select committee said:

"Teamster officials have crushed democracy within the union's ranks. They have rigged elections, hoodwinked and abused their own membership, and lied to them about the conduct of their affairs. They have advanced the cause of union dictatorship and have perverted or ignored their own constitution and bylaws.

* * * * *

"At the recent international convention of the teamsters in Miami, Mr. Beck and Mr. Hoffa, with the help of their bevy of lawyers, made a mockery of the international constitution. They showed that they regarded the constitution as a piece of paper to be obeyed or ignored as it might benefit them. In this instance, the decision was to waive the constitution. Without this action, Mr. Hoffa could not have been elected teamster president.

"Delegates from a New York local who participated actively in the convention were not elected until 10 days after the convention was over. The ultimate cynicism of the Miami situation is demonstrated, however, by the colloquy which took place between the committee and a Hoffa supporter from Detroit. He was asked if he was a delegate to the convention and he replied that he was. He was asked when he was elected and he replied that there was to be a membership meeting that night to consider the nominations and election of delegates and he was to be elected at that time."

Flagrant disregard of democratic procedures was also found to exist in some other unions investigated by the select committee. It may be asked, why did the membership of these unions stand for this kind of an organization? The answer is obvious from illustrations given in the interim report. According to the report members of a local union in Long Island who questioned the actions of local officers were viciously beaten, and when they filed criminal charges were given drumhead trials and barred from the union for a period of 5 years, heavily fined, and deprived of their means to earn a livelihood.

Under the administration's bill the dictatorships in these unions would be prevented by standards required by the bill or would be exposed to the scrutiny of the members and the public under the reporting and disclosure requirements. The unions would be required to report how all officers are selected and to certify that certain standards for the election and removal of officers are provided in their governing documents and are observed.

The administration's bill would require officers of international unions to be elected not less frequently than every 5 years by secret vote or by delegates elected by secret vote. Officers of local unions would be required to be elected not less frequently than every 3 years by secret vote.

The provisions of the administration's bill would assure that all members of the organization would be entitled to nominate and to be candidates, and to vote in secret, upon due notice and without restraint or coercion. The facilities necessary for an honest election, including tellers and observers, would have to be provided by the union.

Unions would be required by the administration bill to report their procedures for the removal of officers. They would also be required to have in their constitutions and bylaws procedures, which would have to be followed, enabling the removal of officers by a majority secret vote where a substantial number of the members indicate that they desire to have such a vote. A prompt election to choose successors to removed officers, conducted in accordance with the standards of the bill, would be required.

The administration bill would empower the Department of Labor to investigate violations of its election provisions without disclosing names of complaining union members. If it were found that violations had occurred and the union refused to comply with the act and take the necessary corrective action, appropriate relief, including the holding of new elections, could be ordered and sanctions could be imposed for willful violations. Fair administrative procedures with judicial enforcement and review are provided by the bill.

Under the administration bill members of unions would be able to bring action in State or Federal courts for relief against violations of the election provisions of the bill in any case where no action or proceeding by the Secretary of Labor was pending. Any existing remedies against irregularities in the election of union officers under other Federal or State law would be preserved. Members bringing, or causing to be brought, any actions or proceedings to enforce the election requirements would be protected from reprisals by a provision in the bill expressly stating that this shall not be grounds for disciplinary action by the union.

The administration's bill would also require the reporting and disclosure of the grounds for suspension or expulsion of members and the provisions made and procedures followed for notice, hearing, judgment and appeal in connection with disciplinary action against members.

These provisions together provide a comprehensive statutory framework that would ensure basic democratic rights for union members, and make available to them adequate remedies when these rights are infringed or threatened.

2. The select committee found that certain international unions "flagrantly abused their power to place local unions under trusteeship or supervisorship" by imposing supervisorship without basis and for unconscionably long periods of time. It found also that supervised locals were "plundered" and used as pawns in political battles within the international unions.

The committee found that two Chicago locals of the International Union of Operating Engineers had been under supervisory control of the international since their creation in 1929. At that time, one local had no members, but it gradually absorbed the members of another Chicago local. Attempts by the members of the local to remove supervisorship were unsuccessful. The man designated to supervise its affairs subsequently became the president of the international. He then relinquished direct control of the local union, but his appointed successors used the funds of the local to buy him, among other things, four Cadillacs, an air conditioner, a TV set and an encyclopedia. The appointed officers of the union were not accountable to the membership for their administration of its financial or other affairs. The situation in the other Chicago local under supervisory control for 29 years seems to have been similar, except that the appointed officers there used the funds for their own personal benefit rather than for the benefit of the president of the international.

And in its findings on the Teamsters' Union the committee states:

"They have indiscriminately used the power of placing locals under trusteeships and kept these union entities in servitude when it served the interests of the union leadership to do so. When a local is under trusteeship, its members completely lose control over their finances and the right to elect their own officials.

"Some 13 percent of all the locals in the Teamsters' Union are under trusteeship, Teamster officials have admitted before the committee that they do not know the reason why some were put under trusteeship or why they remain in that state at the present time. Some of the locals have been under trusteeship for 15 years. One individual, through trusteeship, can control the destinies of many people. Mr. Hoffa is the trustee of some 17 different locals."

The abuses illustrated by these examples would be effectively dealt with by the administration's bill. Under it such control would be permitted to be established only for purposes of ensuring democratic, responsible, and honest administration of the subordinate organization or effectuating legitimate objectives of the labor organizations involved. These objectives would include the elimination of practices which are dishonest or corrupt or in disregard of obligations to members, to employers, to employees, or to the public under applicable laws, collective bargaining agreements, and provisions of constitutions and bylaws. Supervisory control would have to conform also to the applicable provisions of the constitution and bylaws and other governing rules and regulations of the unions involved. It would be permitted only for periods not longer than necessary for correction of the evils in question.

The standards required by the administration's bill would eliminate the possibility of the arbitrary assumption or exercise of supervisory control. Supervisory control would be permitted in proper circumstances because, when properly used, it is a legitimate method for correcting abuse or corruption in subordinate union organizations.

It would appear that any situation justifying the establishment of supervisory control could be cleaned up within a year-and-a-half in most cases. Therefore, the bill would create a presumption that the exercise of control for a period in excess of 18 months is not reasonably necessary. If the union can demonstrate the need for continuing the supervision, the bill would permit its continuance on a year to year basis. In this way control of their affairs would be returned to the members of the subordinate union as soon as possible.

The administration's bill would make it unlawful, subject to criminal penalties, to count the votes of delegates of a supervised local in any convention or election of officers of the supervising union unless the delegates are chosen by the local members by secret vote. The bill would also make it unlawful and a criminal offense to transfer moneys of the supervised union to the supervising union except the per capita taxes and assessments which would otherwise be payable. Under the bill, the prohibitions and penalties provided for convicted criminals serving as union officers and persons permitting such service would apply to persons serving or permitting others to serve as supervisors or trustees of unions under supervisory control.

Special reports would have to be filed with the Department of Labor within 30 days after any assumption of supervisory control by a union over another union, and at 6-month intervals thereafter, showing whether the prescribed standards were being met, what progress was being made in accomplishing the purposes for which the control was assumed, the anticipated length of time required before local autonomy would be restored, and the steps being taken to bring supervisory control to an end.

These provisions of the administration's bill would provide means for correcting the abuses shown in the select committee's interim report by making it possible to prevent arbitrary, prolonged, and corrupt supervisorships. The requirements of the bill concerning exercise of supervisory control would be enforced in much the same way that the provisions governing union elections would be enforced, that is, through the use of administrative processes with provision for judicial enforcement and review and the imposition of administrative and judicial sanctions. This is preferable to providing only for judicial enforcement since it would permit corrections of violations without the formality and expense connected with court trials, reducing the potential costs of administration to the Government as well as to the union organizations concerned. Since our Federal trial courts are already overburdened, the use of administrative processes would permit more rapid action to correct violations. This would be particularly beneficial to the members of the organizations involved since the objective of these provisions is to return control of their affairs to them as soon as possible.

3. Another conclusion of the select committee in the interim report is that "certain managements have extensively engaged in collusion with unions."

Discussing an ex-president of an international union, the committee said, in part:

"The committee testimony clearly shows that there was an under-the-table relationship between William E. Maloney and Stephen A. Healy, founder and head of the S. A. Healy Co., one of the Nation's largest contractors. That this relationship was of great value to Healy and his firm is best demonstrated, in the committee's view, by the testimony that Healy, for a long period of time, was a favored contractor who received special concessions on his union contracts."

With respect to the Teamsters, the committee said in connection with one situation:

"Many Puerto Rican and Negro workers belonging to the Teamster locals established and sponsored by Hoffa in New York received for a 40-hour week the minimum wage of $40, plus $1 to pay their union dues. The working conditions and the treatment that these people have received from those Teamster union officials who signed 'sweetheart' contracts with greedy employers is a disgrace not only to trade unionism but to the moral principles on which this country was built."

The Committee discovered that Teamsters' business agents had, in several instances, negotiated "sweetheart" contracts by which workers' wages were substantially reduced from the level that had previously been maintained.

The committee found that an $11,000 payment was made to John Dioguardi, alias Johnny Dio (a three-time convicted labor racketeer), by the purchasers of his nonunion dress shop so that the shop might remain nonunion. At this time, Dio was running a local union representing other dress-shop workers.

The administration's bill strikes at this evil in several ways. Unions would be required to report the full circumstances of the receipt of anything of value from any employer having employees who are or might be represented by the union. The information required in these reports would have to be made available to each union member in appropriate form and manner. Also, union officers, agents, and key administrative personnel would have to report payments from these employers as well as information on investments and business transactions so related to these employers as to possibly involve conflicts of interest. They would also have to report such transactions by relatives or other third persons if they benefited directly or indirectly. They would not have to report payments permissible under section 302(c) of the Taft-Hartley Act; purchases in the regular course of business at regular prices, or bona fide investments in traded securities if a substantial interest in the business is not involved. Employers would be required to report full information on any transaction directly or indirectly engaged in with the union, its officers, agents, or representatives if the latter are required to report on these matters. These broad requirements are necessary in order to bring conflict-of-interest transactions into the open for examination by the union members and the public—and the information obtained could be published.

Administrative and judicial sanctions would be available to obtain compliance with these reporting requirements. Injunctions to compel compliance would be available, and administrative orders, judicially reviewable and enforcible, could be issued after hearings. Further, the National Labor Relations Board would be required to deny its processes to unions and employers who do not comply with the reporting provisions.

Criminal penalties would be provided for willful failure or refusal to comply, for filing false information, and for concealing or destroying the books and records which those affected would be required to keep. I might point out that the recordkeeping requirement could as easily be thwarted by the concealment of the records as by their destruction.

The administration bill would provide criminal penalties for bribery between employers and their representatives or intermediaries and union officers, agents, or representatives or any trust in which a union is represented. This would be made a felony. Certainly, on the basis of the McClellan committee report, such a provision is necessary in any adequate legislation. In addition, the bill makes a necessary amendment to section 302 of the Taft-Hartley Act to prohibit payments or agreements for payments to any union or its officers or employees by any employer if the union represents any of his employees or has members employed in the same occupations as his employees.

The administration bill, through the combined effect of its broad reporting requirements and its prohibitions on bribery and improper payments between employers and unions and their officials, is designed to eliminate the abuses found with respect to collusion between employers and unions. Employers and unions will be hesitant to engage in the schemes which have been shown to exist in the past because their dealings could no longer be cloaked in secrecy. The bright glare of publicity and the information union members would obtain about the financial affairs of their unions, as well as about the dealings of their union officials and employers, would enable the members to protect their own interests, as well as the assets of their labor organizations.

4. The fourth conclusion stated in the interim report was that there had been "widespread misuse of union funds in the unions studied," that, among other things, "financial safeguards have been woefully lacking," financial reports to members have often been "false, sketchy" and even in those forms unavailable to the members, and destruction of financial records "has been rife."

The hearings before the committee show that $6,663 of the wayward funds of the western conference of teamsters found their way into the purse of an interior decorator, who was engaged by the conference to redecorate the private residence of the conference secretary-treasurer. The dues of the western conference members were used to purchase a new automobile for a friend of a union business agent, and custom tailored suits for the chairman and his horse trainer. The investigation of the financial affairs of this organization was complicated by a mysterious robbery in which the financial records sought by the committee were reportedly ransacked.

Committee records show that in 1956 the expenses of the former president of an international union since expelled from the AFL–CIO included $25,000 for entertainment, dinners, birthday parties, and personal expenses. No bills were submitted to support any of these vouchers.

There was testimony that the former president and the former secretary of another international union (both of whom resigned at the insistence of the AFL–CIO) misappropriated some $66,000 from the union treasury. The committee's interim report states that the president's expenditures were "picayune" when measured against those of his next in command. The "personal items bought on the secretary's trip charge credit card amounted to $1,776; but where he shone best, by comparison with the president, was in the charges paid out for him at hotels—a thumping $30,036." The committee's report points out that this sum did not include his actual hotel bills, for which the union paid about $50,000 (between April 1954 and March 1957) or the bill at a hotel in Washington where the union maintained a room for which it paid about $17,600 during this same period. The report describes how this union officer would order merchandise (such as suits), have them delivered to and paid for by the hotel, which would then put the charge on the union's bill. An air-conditioning unit, three TV sets, three radios, a typewriter, and trampoline lessons were included. All of them were purchased through the handy "hotel pay-out device."

These two officers financed from union funds the purchase of expensive homes and the purchase of items such as a color TV, a woman's suit, a golfer's lamp, and $14,000 for theater tickets.

The committee charged James Hoffa with grossly misusing nearly $2½ million of teamster funds and dispensing them with one end in view: financial assistance to himself and his friends. The committee named Gerald Connelly, "a labor thug," Louis Berra, "convicted of taking kickbacks from a contractor," Paul (The Waiter) Ricca, "considered by many to be the head of the Mafia in America," and many other questionable characters as recipients of Hoffa's financial generosity, at union expense. According to the committee's report, those who received funds from the "friendly teamster lending institution" usually found it convenient to "lend" Hoffa substantial sums in return.

I sincerely believe that the administration's bill would provide the most effective procedures for ensuring that such graft and corruption will not continue. In the first place, it would require that union funds and property be held and administered for the benefit of the members and for furthering the purposes of the union—not for the financial enrichment of union officials. This requirement would be enforcible in any court in a suit by, or in behalf of, union members.

The Administration's bill would also require detailed reporting and disclosure of the financial operations of unions, certain financial transactions of their officers and direct and indirect dealings between union officers and employers which may involve conflicts of interests.

But we cannot rely on reporting and disclosure alone to curb the abuses which have been disclosed. The use of union funds to pay for purely personal items for union officials cannot be expected to be disclosed in a report since payments for such things would, of course, be concealed in some general item. It is imperative, therefore, that adequate authority to investigate alleged violations and to enforce reporting requirements be provided.

The administration's bill provides such authority. It would authorize the Secretary of Labor to conduct investigations either on his own initiative if he had reason to believe a violation had occurred or upon complaint of a union member. It would also authorize the Secretary to subpena witnesses and documents, hold hearings, issue decisions and orders requiring compliance, impose sanctions for willful violations and bring actions in the Federal courts for injunctions to compel compliance with the provisions.

The bill would provide criminal penalties for willful violations of the reporting requirements and other provisions of the act, for concealment or destruction of records required by the act to be kept, for embezzlement of union or certain trust funds and for false entries in or destruction of union books and records.

Any present remedies that union members have under State or Federal laws, in addition to those provided in the bill, would be preserved.

With these provisions, much could be accomplished to eliminate the misuse of union funds. Reports could be carefully examined, with particular attention being given to unreasonably large allowances to officers and to other items that appear questionable. When union members have knowledge that union funds are being spent for purely personal expenditures, they could advise the Department which would then investigate the matter. If investigations disclose wrongdoing, the Secretary could then take immediate action to curb abuses.

Criminal penalties alone are not adequate in this area. If the object of the legislation is to bring into the open the information on which reports are required, there should be some way, such as by obtaining an injunction or by administrative orders, to compel disclosure. Something more is needed than merely providing that those who willfully refuse to report as required may be prosecuted as criminals.

5. The select committee found that violence and coercion in labor disputes still exists "to an extent where it may be justifiably labeled a crime against the community."

It is true that violence, including that in connection with labor disputes, is a matter which the State and local law enforcement agencies should deal with. But much of the labor violence and coercion occurs in connection with matters which are subject to Federal labor-management relations legislation—namely, secondary boycotts and blackmail picketing.

The McClellan committee hearings contain numerous incidents of blackmail picketing where certain unions by the use of violence and intimidation have coerced, or attempted to coerce, employers to deal with them in violation of the representation rights of employees. In Flint, Mich., testimony shows that the business agent of Teamster Local 332 would approach an employer, none of whose employees belonged to his union, to sign a contract or would start picketing for recognition without any warning. An employer who held out despite the picketing met with incidents, such as a fire bomb tossed into his store, sugar poured into truck gas tanks, and personal assaults.

In Scranton, Pa., a building being put up by a nonunion contractor was dynamited, a bakery owner was subjected to bombing and truck damage when he objected to union demands that he and other self-employed drivers cease making deliveries, 3,000 men were pulled off a large Federal construction job to mass picket a nonunion road contractor employing 45 persons who was the object of an organizational drive.

In Tennessee, it was charged, a goon squad, built around a corps of Teamster officials with long police records, was responsible for at least 173 acts of violence in connection with Teamster and other union organizing campaigns over the last 4 years.

Much of this kind of coercion occurred in connection with organizational activities. In many of these cases there was blackmail picketing or the threat of blackmail picketing. In other instances the coercion was for the purposes of forcing a person to cease doing business with a nonunion employer.

The administration's bill would eliminate areas of presently permissible secondary activity which lead to the injury of innocent third parties. It would also eliminate the type of blackmail picketing through which workers are organized against their will and which spawns violence. No bill which fails to contain provisions in these areas of blackmail picketing and the secondary boycott loopholes can claim to be a truly effective labor reform measure.

The testimony before the select committee again and again illustrated the method by which certain unions, particularly the Teamsters, utilized the inadequacies of the present secondary boycott provisions to force employers to do business with only those people approved by union officials. As the interim report of the select committee states: "The economic livelihood of a small tavern or store owner depends on his ability to get deliveries of beer, other beverages and food. The Teamsters have the power to shut these deliveries off and, as the testimony clearly shows, did so * * *."

The extent to which the Teamsters avail themselves of the secondary boycott is evidenced by the fact that 34 percent of the injunctions against secondary boycott activity sought by the National Labor Relations Board from 1947 to 1957 involved the Teamsters. These included only those secondary activities presently covered by the act; it is certain that the incidence of secondary boycotts successfully engaged in by the Teamsters by means of activities not presently prohibited is vastly greater.

The weaknesses of the present secondary boycott provisions of the act are evident when we examine what they now cover. As now written, they require a combination of two factors: First, an objective of the union must be to compel one person to cease doing business with another; second, the means employed to achieve this objective must be through a strike or inducement of employees to concertedly refuse to perform services.

If these factors do not coexist the secondary boycott provisions have not been violated under the law as it now stands. Some unions have, therefore, been able effectively to impose secondary boycotts and yet avoid the proscriptions of the act by directly threatening or coercing the employer (or his supervisory personnel) whom they want to cease doing business with another person. They also avoid the existing provisions by inducing individual employees, or workers not defined as employees by the act such as railroad and agricultural workers—to refuse to handle the products of the person with whom they want the employer to cease doing business. None of these activities is considered to be prohibited under the law as it now stands.

Under present law the Teamsters' Union can appeal to individual truckdrivers to refuse to deliver goods to any establishment, as well as appeal to other individual union men such as repairmen, and maintenance men, to refuse service, with impunity. Since the appeal or threat is directed to the individual truckdriver and helper or repairman, there is no concerted activity if such employees refuse to service the employer objected to. In this fashion the will of the union can be imposed upon the small employer without running afoul of the present law. In addition, the union can go directly to an employer and threaten him with labor troubles if he continues to do business with another employer. Often the threat of labor trouble is as potent a weapon as the trouble itself would be. Thus, pressure can be applied to a secondary employer at these two points without violating the present act. Moreover, since the employer may be coerced, agreements may be forced upon him under which his employees do not have to work on goods produced or handled under conditions unacceptable to the union or on goods produced by persons of whom the union does not approve. Although it has been held under the present law that a union may not seek to enforce such an agreement by inducement of employees to refuse to perform services, direct coercion of an employer by a union such as the Teamsters will get the same result.

One of the cases reported to the select committee illustrates the type of conduct the administration's proposals are designed to eliminate. Testifying before the committee, Tom Coffey, a small Nebraska trucker, told of how he was approached by a persuasive Teamster representative, who informed Mr. Coffey that the Teamsters "didn't have time to fool with a little company, that they were going to organize from the top down." The Teamsters did not claim that they represented a majority of the employees nor did they petition the NLRB to hold an election. When Mr. Coffey refused to deliver his employees to the union, the Teamsters using the secondary boycott put the squeeze on him. His trucks were followed and picketed. Other truckers were advised not to carry freight that had been transported by Mr. Coffey's trucks. Mr. Coffey's business was destroyed.

The testimony of Mr. Clark, copartner of another small Nebraska trucking firm, told of Teamster conduct which followed the same pattern.

Under the administration's proposal the secondary boycott provisions will be broadened and strengthened to make unlawful the type of activity which I have described. If amended as proposed, the scondary boycott provisions will apply to coercion of employers to cease doing business with another. The effect of this type of secondary activity is no less damaging upon employers and employees and no less contrary to the public interest than is the type of secondary activity presently prohibited by the act.

6. The committee found extensive management violations of the Taft-Hartley Act by use of labor spies, "spontaneous" employee committees, and other improper practices.

In its report, the select committee concludes that employers had violated the rights of their employees under the Taft-Hartley Act by interfering with their organization activities and their right to bargain collectively. The committee conducted an extensive investigation of a notorious "labor relations consultant" and his activities on behalf of employers to discourage union organization or to promote company unions or other unions which would not faithfully represent the employees.

Companies made substantial payments to this middleman and his agents which were used in establishing employee committees to oppose unions' organizational campaigns or in creating company unions. On his advice, in one store of a national chain a company-dominated union was created to keep out a legitimate union. Later the company union was discarded in favor of no union at all. Employees who supported the company's varying union policies received special favors, but those who opposed them were discriminated against.

Companies were instructed in the techniques of spying on their employees to learn their views on unions. Funds were given the consultant or his assistants for their services and expenses, and these persons in turn paid the expenses of "spontaneous" employee committees whose purpose was to oppose unionization. In some instances, friendly unions were brought in and agreements signed with them without any consultation with the employees whom the unions were supposed to represent.

All of these activities would appear to be unfair labor practices under the Taft-Hartley Act. However, the procedures provided by that act for the protection of employees must be bolstered against these employer payments to middlemen for activities such as those found by the committee in this case.

The administration's bill would attack this problem in two ways.

First, the bill provides that an employer must make a full report if he directly or indirectly makes specified payments which may involve interference with the rights of individual employees under the Federal labor-management relations laws. This would include direct financial dealings with unions and employees as well as dealings through intermediaries such as labor relations consultants. The appropriate procedures and sanctions applicable to other reports would be applicable to these reports, and these reports would be sufficient to put employees on notice of employer activity detrimental to their interests.

Second, the bill would amend section 302 of the Taft-Hartley Act to make it unlawful for an employer or any person acting in his interest to pay or agree to pay any employee or group of employees of the employer for the purpose of causing employees to interfere with other employees of the employer in the exercise of their rights under the Federal labor-management relations laws. It would also be unlawful for any person to request, receive, or agree to accept such a payment.

These provisions would not prevent an employer from retaining consultants or advisers for the legitimate conduct of labor-management relations, but they would prevent the use of their services to deprive employees of their rights to determine their own status.

7. The committee found that the weapon of organizational picketing has been abused by its use without the consent of employees of picketed establishments and before any of them have indicated any desire to join the union in question.

I have called this abuse blackmail picketing.

The most flagrant abuses of this type brought to light involved the notorious Johnny Dio. As the interim report of the committee pointed out, certain Dio-controlled locals by the use of organizational picketing or the threat of such picketing forced small businessmen into recognizing them and then sold out the very employees over whom they had seized jurisdiction by signing collusive contracts with the employers.

Testimony before the committee as to the activities of the business agent of Teamster Local 332 in Flint, Mich., revealed a similar sordid story. No attempt was made by the Teamsters to persuade employees to join the union or to have a vote held to determine whether the employees wished to be represented by the union. By use of a picket line or the threat of picketing, employers were forced to recognize local 332 and hand the bargaining rights of their employees over to hoodlums and racketeers.

The device which made possible the improper activities in this area uncovered by the select committee was the ability of a union to picket without regard to the wish of the employees.

The administration's bill comes to grips with this problem by dealing directly with the cause, namely the relatively unrestricted availability to unions of the tactic of organizational picketing.

The administration's proposals in this area do not contemplate the elimination of all such picketing. They would restrict it, however, to those situations in which there is some indication that the employees are interested in being represented by the union. Although not within the scope of the Taft-Hartley Act or the administration's picketing amendment Mr. Hoffa's threat to picket police stations and vital facilities in the city of New York, in the face of no showing of interest by the police in being represented by his Teamsters Union, is a good illustration of blackmail picketing. If the picketing had been persisted in, it presumably could only have been terminated either by the police joining the Teamsters against their will or the authorities bargaining with a union not selected as a bargaining representative by the employees involved. This effort failed because Hoffa was met by the overwhelming weight of public opinion. However, the testimony before the select committee has demonstrated that blackmail picketing often succeeds when the targets are the few employees of a small employer where public opinion is difficult to arouse.

Under the administration's proposals picketing, or a threat to picket where the union cannot demonstrate that there is a sufficient interest on the part of employees in having it represent them, or where the picketing has continued for an unreasonably long period of time without an election being conducted, could be met by the employer or an aggrieved employee going to the NLRB and charging an unfair labor practice. The charge would receive priority and speedy handling, and the NLRB regional director could get, promptly, a court order to prohibit such blackmail picketing.

Under present law, an employer who has recognized and entered into an agreement with a union which has demonstrated to his satisfaction that it has been designated as bargaining representative by a majority of his employees, but which is not certified by the National Labor Relations Board, may be subject to picketing by another union. This is an unfair situation because under the law the employer must recognize and bargain with the union having majority status, whether or not it is certified. However, he, his employees, and the majority union may be subjected to the harassment of picketing by a stranger union.

The administration's proposals would eliminate this possibility. Under circumstances where the employer has recognized a union in accordance with the act, picketing by another union would be prohibited.

Another type of situation which would be met by this proposal is where an organizational campaign terminates in a representation election in which no union is certified. Under the present law the employer and the employees may be subjected to organizational picketing, even though the employees have rejected representation by the picketing union.

The administration's proposal would eliminate this possibility by barring representation picketing if within the preceding 12 months a valid election has been held. After the employees have indicated their rejection of union representation they should be left free for a reasonable period of time from organizational efforts by picketing.

The total effect of these proposals in the administration bill would be to regulate picketing so that employers and their employees will not be subject to the continuous coercion of an organizational picket line. The National Labor Relations Board, in administering these provisions, would determine when unions had sufficient interest to justify such picketing and what under particular circumstances would be a reasonable period of time for such action. Flexible application of these standards would contribute to more equitable and orderly labor relations, as well as eliminate the abuses of picketing for representation purposes which have made possible many of the improper activities revealed by the Senate select committee.

8. It was found that gangsters and hoodlums have successfully infiltrated into some labor unions.

As stated by the chairman of the Senate select committee at the opening of the New York City phase of the 1957 hearings, hoodlums and racketeers are attracted to the labor movement because of the opportunities for using labor charters as an instrument of extortion from employers and the victimization of the union membership.

An example of the first type of activity is the Mount Hood Cafe in Portland, Oreg., which happened to have a pinball machine owned by someone outside the union combine. The owner was told to take the machine out or he would be picketed. At the instigation of a convicted burgler, who happened to be head of Teamsters' Joint Council No. 37 in Portland and the Teamster's international organizer for the State of Oregon, pickets did appear and had a severe effect on the cafe's business. The owner told the committee if he had not removed the nonunion combine machine, as directed by the union business agent, he would have gone bankrupt.

In the New York City area the committee found that from a local established in 1950 by the union, now known as the Allied Industrial Workers of America, a whole string of units of the same organization sprang up which came under the domination of Johnny Dio. Under Dio's influence 40 men were brought into the labor movement in positions of trust and responsibility—men who, among them, had been arrested a total of 178 times and convicted on 77 of these occasions for crimes including theft, violations of the Harrison Narcotics Act, extortion, conspiracy, felonious assault, violation of the weapons laws, being an accessory to murder, forgery, and possession of stolen mail.

The administration's bill would strike at this situation by barring all convicted felons from serving as union officials for such time as they have lost the right to vote. It further holds responsible union officials liable for any such persons assuming union office. Violations of these provisions would be subject to criminal penalties and the Secretary of Labor would be authorized to prevent by judicially enforceable orders the assumption of union positions by such persons.

I think this legislation should bar from union office for the length of time specified by Congress anyone convicted of any felony and not just certain felonies. Specifically mentioning certain crimes that would make a person ineligible might result in a failure, for example, to cover all the categories of crimes found in the backgrounds of the New York paper local officials. The Secretary of Labor should not be given the task of determining whether or not assumption of office by such persons would be contrary to the purposes of the act, placing him in the dubious position of guaranteeing to the millions of union members the future good conduct of convicted felons.

The administration bill's restriction of organizational picketing for blackmail purposes against the desires of the employees and the closing of loopholes in the secondary boycott provisions would also act as deterrents to gangster infiltration into unions by limiting devices which are susceptible to use for criminal activities by persons such as Dio and which provide some of the inducement for gangsters to move into the labor movement.

9. Finally, it was found by the select committee that there is an extensive no man's land in jurisdiction over labor-management relations which leaves employers and employees with no recourse to any governmental agency.

Several of the witnesses before the committee testified that abuses uncovered by the committee occurred in this no man's land between State and Federal jurisdiction. The interim report of the committee pointed out that in the committee's inquiry into activities in the New York area it was shown that exploitation of workers and circumvention of legitimate labor organizations were made possible because employers had no recourse to any governmental agency.

While there is general agreement on the need for dealing with the problem, there is considerable difference in the approaches suggested.

I do not think that requiring the Board to assert jurisdiction over all disputes arising under the National Labor Relations Act meets the no man's land problem. This proposal, in my opinion, is unworkable and unrealistic. The Board, as a practical matter, cannot assert jurisdiction to the full reach of the act. To attempt to do so would force the Board to dissipate its energies upon countless numbers of disputes in small establishments which, although they affect commerce, are primarily local in character. The result would so increase the length of time required to dispose of proceedings brought before the Board as to render its processes ineffective.

Even if the Board were to be given increased funds to further extend its jurisdictional standards (and I think that the Board should exercise jurisdiction to the fullest extent that is reasonably possible), there would remain numerous business establishments whose activities affect commerce so slightly and are so peculiarly local as to make it unwise, as well as impractical, for the Board to take jurisdiction over labor disputes which involve them. The only way in which a forum may be provided for disputes of this kind is to make it clear that agencies and courts of the States and Territories can act when the Board declines to assert jurisdiction. To fail to do this would be to leave many of the racketeering activities directed against small employers in an area in which no relief is available either from the Federal Government or the States.

The administration proposal would specifically authorize the Board to decline jurisdiction where it does not consider that the effect on commerce is sufficiently substantial to warrant the exercise of its jurisdiction and would authorize the States to act where the Board so declines. Prior to the Supreme Court's decision in the Guss case many State agencies and courts assumed that they had such authority and asserted jurisdiction in this area. The effect of the administration's proposal, therefore, is no more than to make legal a situation which existed prior to the Guss decision.

In addition to eliminating this jurisdictional gap, the administration's bill would enable the National Labor Relations Board to expedite its procedures by authorizing it to conduct representation elections without a prior hearing where there is no substantial objection. This would particularly expedite the Board's work in those cases where there are no significant issues and where it is likely that the election itself would determine what issues there are and eliminate any requirement for further Board action.

This proposal would also eliminate a device used by parties for delaying purposes only. In the case of the Coffey Transfer Co., referred to previously, the ability of the Teamsters union to delay a representation election involving only seven employees was one of the factors which put Coffey out of business. Mr. Coffey filed petitions for an election in September 1955 but by raising questions as to the appropriate unit and filing unfair labor practice charges the teamsters delayed an election until January 1956. The union's loss of this election was not certified until April because of challenges of the voting eligibility of certain strike replacements. In the meantime, in March 1956, Mr. Coffey had sold his business for one-third of what he had been offered 3 years previously.

The administration's proposal relating to the designation of an acting general counsel is also designed to prevent any delays in the operations of the Board. In the case of the sudden resignation or incapacity of a general counsel the work of the Board could be slowed down drastically unless a successor is immediately nominated and confirmed by the Senate, which is not always the case, because of the general counsel's final authority over the issuance of complaints. It is not clear that this function can be performed by any person other than the regularly appointed incumbent of that office.

The administration's bill contains two other amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act which are directly related to the labor-management reform aspects of the bill. One is the amendment of sections 9(f) and (g) so as to continue the present requirement that unions conform with reporting requirements as a condition of access to the processes of the act and to extend the requirement to employers. The second is the amendment of section 302 of the act, relating to improper employer payment to employee rerpesentatives, so as to extend it to additional persons and types of payments.

To promote sound industrial relations and thereby lessen possible labor strife, some other amendments are also necessary.

The administration's proposal authorizing the Board to certify unions in the building and construction industry without a prior election is designed to accommodate the unique employment practices of that industry under the representation provisions of the act. The authority of the Board in this respect, however, is carefully conditioned upon certain factors so as to insure that the freedom of employees to belong to a union of their own choosing is not infringed. This proposal would enable construction unions to acquire Board certification, with the protections that certification provides for unions, and would contribute to the stability of labor relations in that essential industry.

The adminisration's proposals with respect to the voting rights of replaced economic strikers and requiring employers, as well as unions, to file non-Communist affidavits are designed to remove inequities in the act which have long been apparent. The proposal regarding bargaining during the life of a contract has the same purpose.

The proposal to require the Board to be bipartisan in composition is to bring it in line in this respect with other regulatory agencies.

I am submitting at this time for the information of the committee and incorporation into the RECORD an explanation of the bill which contains a careful section-by-section summary of its provisions.

I think I can best close this statement by quoting the following paragraph from the President's labor message:

"Complete and effective labor-management legislation, not a piecemeal program, is essential to assure the American public that true, responsible collective bargaining can be carried on with full protection to the rights and freedoms of workers and with adequate guarantees of the public interest. These recommendations, when adopted, should do much to eliminate those abuses and improper practices which, I am firmly convinced, the American public expects and believes will be corrected through legislative action. Equally important, they will do so without imposing arbitrary restrictions or punitive measures on the legitimate activities of honest labor and management officials."

The enactment of the President's program into law will be a great service to the country and its working men and women; the enactment of anything less than this program would provide no more than a partial answer to the public demand and great need for this legislation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

A MORE DYNAMIC AND COMPREHENSIVE URBAN-RENEWAL PROGRAM—STATEMENT BY RICHARD C. LEE

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, on January 26 the able and distinguished mayor of New Haven, the Honorable Richard C. Lee, testified before the Housing Subcommittee of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. Mayor Lee came to Washington to urge a more dynamic and comprehensive urban renewal program. He is preeminently qualified to do so since, both in practice and in theory, he has long been one of the Nation's foremost authorities in this field.

He is more than an authority. He is a leader and a doer. The magnificent program which he has put into effect in New Haven has caught the imagination not only of Connecticut, but of people all over the country who are interested in this vital problem.

The testimony of Mayor Lee before the Housing Subcommittee was an eloquent and reasoned plea for a vastly expanded program of slum clearance and urban redevelopment. I think it ought to be read by all who are interested in this question or who have to pass judgment on it.

Today, the Senate begins consideration of housing legislation. In the next day or two, we shall decide the fate of housing, slum clearance, and urban renewal for the immediate future. For that reason, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted at this point in the RECORD the testimony of Mayor Lee, in order that it may be made available to every Senator before the Senate passes judgment on this crucial problem.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TESTIMONY OF MAYOR RICHARD C. LEE, OF NEW HAVEN, CONN., BEFORE THE HOUSING SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE SENATE BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE, JANUARY 26, 1959

My name is Richard C. Lee. I am mayor of the city of New Haven. I am testifying as mayor of New Haven and on behalf of the American Municipal Association as chairman of its urban renewal committee.

I would like to begin by endorsing wholeheartedly the statement this morning of my good friend and colleague, Mayor Anthony Celebrezze, of Cleveland.

We mayors have given a lot of thought to urban renewal, public housing, and the related FHA 220 and 221 programs. In cooperation with other groups, such as the National Association of Housing and Redevelopment Officials, the National Housing Conference, and others, we have prepared a detailed legislative program for submission to the Congress.

On the Senate side, much of our program is contained in Senator SPARKMAN'S bill (S. 57). Senator CLARK'S bill (S. 193) fits even more closely our ideas of the size of the program required for the years ahead if we are really to do a job on slums and blight.

Mayor Celebrezze's statement outlines our position very thoroughly and I do not propose to duplicate what he has said.

Instead, I should like on this, my fourth successive yearly visit to your committee, to discuss, briefly and frankly, some of the broad national issues involved in the legislation before you.

In the last 4 years our program in New Haven has gone well indeed, despite many heartbreaking delays. I will not attempt to describe our problems and our progress but I would like to give you each a copy of the latest annual report of our Citizens Action Commission. It contains a very good description of our program. I am proud of the fact that our city and its people have just won the All-American City Award of the National Municipal League and Look magazine.

Our experience in New Haven, my work as chairman of the AMA's Urban Renewal Committee, the visits I have made to other cities and the discussions I have had with visiting delegations have given me an unusual opportunity to see the problems of our cities at first hand. I do not claim a theoretical or technical knowledge of urban problems but I do have an administrator's working knowledge.

I wish I could report on the basis of what I have learned that year by year we are making progress as a nation in our war against slums and blight. Here and there there are encouraging signs. The facts are, however, that in the Nation we are engaged only in a limited rearguard action against slums.

I am appalled at the slum conditions I have seen. After 10 years of slum clearance under the Housing Act of 1949, urban slums are more widespread than ever before and seem to be growing faster.

In this period, millions of American families have fled to FHA insured housing in the suburbs to escape blight. In the same time hundreds of millions of dollars have been invested in suburban shopping centers and industrial parks. A new America has been created around our cities and the old America inside has been left to rot away.

I. THE URBAN RENEWAL PROGRAM IS IN THE MIDDLE OF A DISTURBING SLOWDOWN

1. Between September 5 and December 31 of 1958 only five projects moved into the action stage with loan and grant contracts totaling only $4.1 million.

2. In the same period, there were practically no new projects approved for the survey and planning stage.

3. The Administration has adopted a rationing formula for the distribution of unallocated funds which puts us all on a starvation diet. Together with other administrative actions it has all but destroyed urban renewal as we knew it only a year ago and substituted a weakened approach which gives us the form of urban renewal without the substance. It will never do the job.

4. Despite all the fond hopes, only 2,931 units of section 220 FHA insured housing have actually been completed in urban renewal areas, with only 6,994 more under construction.

5. The record of section 221 FHA insured relocation housing is even more dismal. Five hundred and sixty-five units have been completed and 727 units are under construction.

6. The public housing program has been so strangled by redtape that despite the need for new units, few cities are willing to run the gantlet.

Unpleasant though it may be, we must face the fact that the urban renewal program is not producing at anything like the pace which is needed.

For this situation the Congress must accept responsibility along with the administration. There has never been enough money made available and last year there was no legislation at all.

II. THERE IS NO PRACTICAL ALTERNATIVE TO SUBSTANTIAL FEDERAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR SLUM CLEARANCE AND URBAN RENEWAL PROGRAMS

I would ask you please to bear in mind that we mayors are not down here seeking a handout. The urban renewal program involves not only one local tax dollar for every two Federal dollars, it also requires us to go out and organize our community to support the program, with all the disruption to established habit patterns which it brings. I can assure you that the political risks in this program are all on the local level and they are substantial.

We mayors are more than a little disturbed at the spender label which is plastered so readily on anyone who wants to raise the standard of living in our cities in a way which requires the expenditure of public funds for capital improvements whether they be new schools or sewers or slum clearance projects.

We believe in the free-enterprise system. It has given the American people a standard of living undreamed of even a generation ago. But unhappily slums and blight also seem to prosper in our present-day economy. We have searched in vain for some way in which we could get the profit motive operating an effective slum clearance and urban renewal program without Government financial aid.

I am satisfied that there is no such private enterprise solution and for a very simple reason. Except for midtown Manhattan and a few isolated patches of real estate elsewhere it is just not profitable to tear down income-producing slums and put up slumproof improvements.

This is a matter of simple economics. You cannot pay market value for slum properties even if you could assemble them at all in parcels of suitable size, then relocate the families, tear down the buildings, put up new structures with proper setbacks, provide offstreet parking and still make a normal profit.

In the absence, therefore, of a workable, private enterprise alternative—which everyone would automatically label "good"—we must seek out a workable public alternative, which necessarily requires public funds and is therefore, in the minds of too many, automatically evil.

The President has suggested that the cities and the States assume a gradually increasing share of the cost of urban renewal in accordance with the predominantly local benefits received.

Speaking personally, I would like to see the cities assume sole responsibility for the financing and execution of urban renewal projects. I am confident that the savings in time and money could lead directly to substantial savings of as much as 20 percent in the net cost of each urban renewal project.

The simple fact, however, is that the cities and the States of our Nation would bankrupt themselves financing an adequate urban renewal program on the basis of the present distribution of taxing powers.

It seems to me that those who make proposals for local assumption of the cost of urban renewal should be prepared with a specific taxing proposal to raise the wherewithal.

We mayors are practical people. We see no sign of the Federal Government's giving up significant taxing powers to us. Nor is private enterprise able to do the job.

We have no choice, therefore, but to come down to Washington and ask for a fair share of Federal funds. The key question of course is, What is a fair share?

III. THE ALLOCATION OF FEDERAL MONEY AMONG THE VARIOUS NONDEFENSE PROGRAMS AS PROPOSED IN THE 1960 BUDGET IS OBSOLETE

The President's $77 billion budget provides for a 6-year urban renewal program beginning at $250 million per year and going down. The actual cash appropriation sought is only $145 million, one indication that a speedup in urban renewal is not expected next year either.

One way to determine the fairness of this proposal is to compare it with others in the budget.

For the purpose of comparison the $145 million figure is the one which most directly affects the taxpayer next year. Anyone who feels that the comparison would be more valid can substitute the authorization figures.

Here is what I find in studying the President's budget.

The new budget provides $4.49 billion for the stabilization of farm prices and farm income under a program which, nonetheless, the President still describes as outmoded and unsuited. This is over 30 times as much as the $145 million recommended for slum clearance.

Even the financing of rural electrification and rural telephones gets twice as much ($335 million) as is made available to cities to get rid of slums.

Research and other agricultural services get $301 million; financing farmownership and operation, $196 million; conservation and development of agricultural land and water resources, $675 million.

All in all a cash expenditure of $6 billion for agriculture in 1960 against $145 million for slum clearance.

I am not picking on farmers. We all need them, probably even more than they need us. Nor am I questioning any of the specific programs involved. I am in no position to evaluate them. And I might say there are many other nondefense functions which get much more out of this economy budget than slum clearance.

It is my belief, however, that somewhere along the line the Federal Government has failed to keep up with changing times. Here are my statistics to back up this statement.

IV. MORE AMERICANS LIVE IN SLUMS THAN ON FARMS

Incredible as it may seem, in the richest country in the world, more Americans live in the slums of our cities, North, South, East, and West, than on all of the farms in the Nation.

Here are the facts. On Friday, January 23, 1959, the census clock in the Department of Commerce reported our total population as 175,764,235.

On that same date the Bureau of the Census reported 20,837,000 living on farms in America. Our most conservative estimate of slum dwelling units in America runs over 6.5 million. At the Census Bureau figure of 3.35 persons per household, the slum population of America today is 21,775,000 and growing. In round figures, the conclusion inescapably reached is a simple one—approximately 1 million more people live in America's slums than live on all of her farms.

The 65 percent of the American population who live in the cities and pay 75 percent of the total Federal tax bill, are being told by the President that $6 billion in cash is necessary from their tax money this year for a farm program which he has stated is outmoded. At the same time they are being told that slum clearance primarily benefits them as city dwellers but in the same breath that the United States this year can only afford $145 million in cash and an authorization of $250 million for new programs.

Put another way, the administration proposes $34 per capita from each person in the United States for the farm program and only 83 cents for slum clearance.

Aid for slum clearance in this economy budget comes to $72.50 per slum dweller. At that rate we will not clear our slums in this century.

Aid for agriculture comes to an incredible $3,000 per farm dweller per year. Give us that much money in the cities per slum dweller for just 1 year and we will never have to come back.

Gentlemen, I respectfully suggest that whether in or out of balance on the income-outgo side, this budget is disturbingly far out of line in its recognition of the pressing nondefense needs of the American people.

This budget, if adopted, would lead to a further drying up of the urban renewal program as ever-expanding slums and blight engulf evermore millions of our fellow citizens.

It is inconceivable to me that in this, the richest Nation in the world, we cannot afford to eliminate our slums completely and to begin the job right now.

We mayors ask you to approve a program of $600 million a year for 10 years. Our surveys and our own direct knowledge and observation of the size of the problem in our cities indicate to us that this full sum is required.

In the light of the 1960 budget allocations—at least on the domestic level—our requests are not unreasonable. The resources of our Nation are not so meager that we need put up with even one slum-dwelling unit.

I urge that we, all of us, raise our sights. Thank you.

TRIBUTE TO USO

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, today, February 4, the United Service Organizations—better known to the Nation and our millions of service men and women as USO—observes its 18th birthday.

During its lifetime, the USO has provided millions of our military personnel with a home away from home. This group of voluntary, civilian organizations and personnel—not a part of the Government—includes the Young Men's Christian Association, the National Catholic Community Service, the National Jewish Welfare Board, the Young Women's Christian Association, the Salvation Army, and the National Travelers Aid Association.

As an illustration of the scope of activities, in 1958 the USO utilized the services of some 80,000 men and women, and sponsored 1,375 overseas shows and many more thousands of local programs. Also, the USO staffed 267 clubs, provided information to service personnel, made housing placement facilities available, and serviced snackbars for millions.

Overall, the USO brings hometown friendship and understanding to our troops wherever stationed—here and abroad.

For financial support, the USO depends upon the united funds, community chests, and other voluntary community campaigns. This year, it will require $11,500,000 to effectively carry out its splendid programs. The American people, I am sure, will again demonstrate—by support—their confidence in this constructive organization for furthering the spiritual, recreational, and welfare needs of our military forces.

The Nation, indeed, owes a debt of gratitude to the USO and the individuals involved for an outstanding record of service.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, today marks the 18th anniversary of USO service to members of our Armed Forces of the United States. This organization is a voluntary civilian group of six national agencies, namely, the Young Men's Christian Association, the National Catholic Community Service, the National Jewish Welfare Board, the Young Women's Christian Association, the Salvation Army, and the National Travelers Aid Association.

President Eisenhower has sent the following message to USO President Holgar J. Johnson:

As the United Service Organizations complete 18 years of service to our Armed Forces, it is a pleasure to extend, through you, my warm greetings to the volunteers and leaders of the USO. Skill and understanding, backed by the generous support of American citizens, have enabled the USO to bring many friendly services to our men and women in uniform. As you face the challenge of another year, I am confident that the USO will continue to enjoy the confidence of our people here at home and the appreciation of our service personnel stationed around the world.

Gen. Nathan F. Twining, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, declared:

The continuation of this USO service is perhaps even more important at the present time than during a period of actual war.

During wartime a visible incentive exists for the young soldier who is enduring hardships far from home. However, this incentive of actual conflict does not exist today and the constant waiting in a condition of readiness or alert creates a heavy strain on morale.

Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, of Texas, our distinguished majority leader, said:

The USO fulfilled a function that could not be duplicated by any other agency because it kept the members of the armed services in close and intimate contact with home. * * * There is the need to keep men aware of the fact that their fellow Americans are supporting them, not only physically but spiritually. That was the role of the USO—a role which was performed superbly.

Senator EVERETT M. DIRKSEN, of Illinois, our esteemed minority leader, declared:

Its (USO's) contributions to morale and to the spirit of our military men particularly in the lonesome outposts across the world have been truly magnificent. It will have made a lasting impression upon millions of Americans, and it so richly deserves the most generous salute from our people everywhere.

Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY, of Massachusetts, said:

To those of us who served in the Armed Forces during the war or since, USO is an especially meaningful testimonial to the American tradition of community services and public welfare. It is impossible to measure in words the contribution which the USO has made in enlarging the welfare and spiritual oportunities for Americans. In this country and abroad, USO has become a home away from home and a living example of America's humanity.

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt said:

USO keeps right on doing work with our soldiers here in this country and with our soldiers now stationed in so many far distant areas of the world. * * * It tries to bring a little bit of home to the servicemen who are away from home and to make us at home feel a sense of responsibility about them and give them a feeling that they still have a sense of responsibility for their home.

Lloyd W. Dinkenspiel, president of the National Jewish Welfare Board, said:

It has been the genius of USO that it has drawn into its volunteer ranks Americans of all faiths and from all economic strata, dedicated to serving men in uniform. In a sense, this huge army of volunteers dedicated to service is a testimonial of faith in USO and its aims. USO has been a valuable ally in our total defense effort—a beacon to our soldiers and a source of comfort to their families.

Arthur A. Schuck, chief Scout executive, Boy Scouts of America, said:

The USO is to be congratulated on having completed its 18th year of service to the millions of young men who have gone through the armed services since 1941.

The tremendous service performed during World War II brought magnificent results in morale and spirit among our troops. The moral influences of your six member organizations have had a direct effect on our Nation. Those values have continued since World War II and you can continue to make significant contributions.

J. Clinton Hawkins, president of YMCA National Council, and Vivian C. McCollom, chairman, YMCA National Board, said:

Incorporated into the USO structure are sound basic principles of service shared by all of its member agencies. Experience has proved that, in the implementation of these principles, people of different faiths can cooperate in providing these common services and yet infuse them with the spirit of their own religious traditions.

Mr. President, it was my privilege today, as a member of the National Board of Governors of USO, to escort eight members of the Armed Forces on a Capitol Hill tour. These young men and women of the Air Force, the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps, visited with Senators from their home States and they were in the gallery during debate on important legislation. They journeyed to the Supreme Court, where they met one of the Associate Justices and also visited the Library of Congress.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], whose career in the Armed Forces was outstanding, said to these representatives of our Armed Forces in a stimulating talk in his office that he was not preaching when he reminded them "to give the best that you have and the best will come back to you."

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bible	Hartke	Mundt
Byrd, W. Va.	Hayden	Murray
Cannon	Holland	Prouty
Chavez	Hruska	Proxmire

Ellender	Langer	Stennis
Frear	Mansfield	Talmadge
Green	McNamara	Williams, N.J.
Gruening	Morse	Yarborough
Hart	Moss	Young, N. Dak.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL] is absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is not present.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

After a little delay, Mr. AIKEN, Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. BENNETT, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. BUSH, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. BYRD of Virginia, Mr. CAPEHART, Mr. CARLSON, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, Mr. CASE of South Dakota, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. COOPER, Mr. COTTON, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. EASTLAND, Mr. ENGLE, Mr. ERVIN, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. GORE, Mr. HENNINGS, Mr. HICKENLOOPER, Mr. HILL, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, Mr. KEFAUVER, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. KERR, Mr. KUCHEL, Mr. LAUSCHE, Mr. LONG, Mr. MARTIN, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. MCCLELLAN, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. MONRONEY, Mr. MORTON, Mr. MUSKIE, Mr. O'MAHONEY, Mr. PASTORE, Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. SCHOEPPEL, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. SYMINGTON, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. WILEY, Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware, and Mr. YOUNG of Ohio entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, is the Senate still in the morning hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; is there further morning business?

SUPPORTING FIGURES ON THE HOUSING BILL

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, yesterday the distinguished junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] made some remarks on the housing bill. I thought perhaps he would have some amplification of his remarks in the form of supporting figures; and I should like to make inquiry of him now as to whether he proposes to insert such figures in the RECORD at this time.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, on Monday, when I expressed my interest in housing, but my objection to exceeding the budget estimate at this time, however desirable the program might be, I was asked by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana whether I could obtain for him figures on the indirect obligations of the Government. I said I could not do so offhand, but that I would furnish them.

I now ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a tabulation furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury showing that the indirect obligations of the Government amount to $297 billion. But that, of course, includes some insurance funds which we never expect to become actual liabilities.

Then I call attention to the reference in the President's budget, at pages 957 to 969, to the Federal credit programs. That shows a larger contingent liability for housing than the Treasury figures indicate. The budget shows only $23 billion for 1958 on FHA, to increase to $37 billion in 1960; and it shows that the Veterans' Administration guarantees will increase from $30 billion to $38 billion. The budget indicates that the grand total will rise from $76,900,000,000 in 1958 to $104,800,000,000 in 1960.

Mr. President, I also state that the housing bill would increase the direct borrowing from the Treasury, for college dormitories, dining halls, and other facilities, by $525 million. That would result in a new category of borrowing.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD figures showing the total which has been borrowed from the Treasury, which is nearly $30 billion, and also showing the $25 billion which has been authorized, and can still be borrowed, and thus can bypass the Appropriations Committee.

There being no objection, the statement and tabulations were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LONG-RANGE COMMITMENTS AND CONTINGENCIES OF THE U.S. GOVERNMENT AS OF JUNE 18, 1958

The attached statement covers the major financial commitments of the U.S. Government, except the public debt outstanding and those involving recurring costs for which funds are regularly appropriated by the Congress and are not yet obligated, such as aid to States for welfare programs and participation in employee-retirement systems. The statement is segregated into four categories, namely (a) loans guaranteed and insured by Government agencies, (b) insurance in force, (c) obligations issued on credit of the United States, and (d) undisbursed commitments, etc.

The items appearing in this statement are quite different from the direct debt of the United States. They are programs of a long-range nature that may or may not commit the Government to expend funds at a future time. The extent to which the Government may be called upon to meet these commitments varies widely. The liability of the Government and the ultimate disbursements to be made are of a contingent nature and are dependent upon a variety of factors, including the nature of and value of the assets held as a reserve against the commitments, the trend of prices and employment, and other economic factors.

Caution should be exercised in any attempt to combine the amounts in the statement with the public debt outstanding for that would involve not only duplication but would be combining things which are quite dissimilar. As indicated by the enclosed statement, there are $107.8 billion of public debt securities held by Government and other agencies as part of the assets that would be available to meet future losses. The following examples illustrate the need for extreme caution in using data on the contingencies and other commitments of the United States Government.

1. The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation had insurance outstanding as of June 23, 1958, the latest available, amounting to $129 billion. The experience of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has been most favorable. During the period this Corporation has been in existence, premiums and other income have substantially exceeded losses which has permitted the retirement of Treasury and Federal Reserve capital amounting to $289.3 million (all repaid to Treasury), and the accumulation of $1.9 billion reserve as of June 30, 1958. The Corporation's holdings of public debt securities as of that date amounted to $2 billion which already appears in the public debt total. Out of $255.6 billion of assets in insured banks as of June 23, 1958, the latest available, $68.8 billion are in public debt securities (also reflected in the public debt). The assets, both of insured banks and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, as well as the continued income of the Corporation from assessments and other sources, stand between insured deposits and the Government's obligation to redeem them.

2. The face value of life insurance policies issued to veterans and in force as of June 30, 1958, amounted to $43.6 billion. This does not represent the Government's potential liabilities under these programs since some of these policies will probably be permitted to lapse and future premiums, interest and the invested reserves amounting to $6.9 billion of public debt securities should cover the normal mortality risk.

3. Under the Federal Reserve Act of 1913, as amended, Federal Reserve notes are obligations of the United States which, as of June 30, 1958, amounted to $25.9 billion. The full faith and credit of the United States is behind the Federal Reserve currency. These notes are a first lien against the $51.5 billion of assets of the issuing Federal Reserve banks which includes $25.4 billion of Government securities already included in the public debt. These notes are specifically secured by collateral deposited with the Federal Reserve agents which, as of June 30, 1958, amounted to $17.4 billion in Government securities and $12.3 billion in gold certificates.

[1] The Corporation finances part of its activities by issuing certificates of interest to private lending agencies. The outstanding amount of $244,000,000, as of June 30, 1958, is included in this figure.
[2] Includes accrued interest.
[3] Represents the Administration's portion of insurance liability. The estimated amount of insurance in force and loan reports in process as of June 30, 1958, is $1,175,000,000. Insurance on loans shall not exceed 10 percent of the total amount of such loans.
[4] The Export-Import Bank of Washington acts as agent in carrying out this program.
[5] Represents deferred participations.
[6] Represents estimated insurance coverage for the 1958 crop year.
[7] Figures are as of June 23, 1958.
[8] Excludes accrued interest.
[9] Includes public debt securities amounting to $17,420,000,000 that have been deposited with the Federal Reserve agents as specific collateral.

NOTE.—The above figures are subject to the limitations and precautionary remarks, as explained in the note attached to this statement.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, last of all, let me say that on Monday I inserted in the RECORD the figures furnished by the Home and Housing Administrator on the Sparkman bill, as then introduced. I was discussing the bill as introduced, as compared with the figures proposed by the Administrator. Some changes were made in the bill, and they result in a reduction by approximately $100 million of the impact on the 1960 cash budget. That is a reduction in loans to be made for veterans' housing. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the complete comparison, furnished me on yesterday by the Administrator, of the committee bill and of the Administration's position. The figures still show, however, that from the standpoint of obligational authority, the committee bill is one billion, two hundred and some-odd million dollars more.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD in the chair). The Senate is still proceeding in the morning hour, and the 3 minutes available to the Senator from Illinois have been consumed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for an additional 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: Has the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Virginia—to make certain insertions in the RECORD—been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I was on the floor, and wished to reserve the right to object, not for the purpose of attempting to prevent the publication of the figures in the RECORD, but in order to have an opportunity to make brief remarks.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I have the floor; and I yield first to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I hope I shall be permitted to receive the question which my colleague, the Senator from Illinois, wishes to ask, and then to reply to it.

Then, inasmuch as the chief patron of the bill wishes to ask a question, I hope that opportunity will also be afforded.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, at this time I yield to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS].

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, my question is this: In the total of over $200 billion of potential obligations on the part of the Government, how much of that amount is for the guarantee of bank deposits, how much is for the guarantee of insurance on FHA, and how much is for the guarantee of insurance on Veterans' Administration?

Mr. ROBERTSON. The figure for bank deposits is $194 billion. That is the largest item. Then insurance is included. As I have said, those are items which we do not think will become actual liabilities.

Mr. DOUGLAS. So the actual obligations of the Federal Government are not as great as the extremely large, global figure originally cited by the Senator from Virginia would indicate. Is that correct?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes. The Treasury Department calls attention to all these things, and says they must not be treated as actual liabilities, nor must they be confounded with the national debt. It is just a summary of the liabilities. We cannot say that one is a potential liability and another one is not. When the Government has extended its credit, all of them must be included.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional 3 minutes granted the Senator from Illinois have expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Then, Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, may I be recognized?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I have hurriedly looked at the figures the distinguished chairman-to-be of our committee has submitted. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] has casually looked at them, too.

I wish to say that I do not wholly agree as to their accuracy; and if the Senator from Virginia will, for the time being, hold up putting them into the RECORD, I think we might have an opportunity to check the figures a little more carefully, a little later.

In the meantime, Mr. President, I should like to make a brief comment: When the Senator from Virginia gives the totals for the two programs, of course he does not state the difference between the bill as reported to the Senate and the proposal of the Administration in the case of additional FHA insurance authorizations. The Administration figure for that item was $2 billion in excess of the amount called for by the bill as it was reported, and $4 billion in excess of what my bill proposes.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, in order to keep the record and the facts straight—because the figures the able Senator from Virginia has were prepared by the Federal Housing Administration—let me say they were prepared earlier yesterday morning, after the Senate Banking and Currency Committee had reported the bill at 6:30 p.m. the day before; and it was impossible for anyone to get all the facts regarding what was contained in the bill as then reported. For that reason, and in order to be fair to the Federal Housing Administration, and not get into the RECORD any figures which are not accurate, I suggest that the figures be held up for several hours until they can be rechecked, because I believe the Administration has now rechecked its figures, and finds—after the officials were able to read the bill and read the report and understand exactly what is contained in them—that there have been some changes.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, in view of the statement made by our distinguished colleague, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], who is the ranking Republican member of our committee—I refer to his statement that the Republican head of this Administration had furnished me figures which are not accurate—I withdraw my request, and later shall resubmit the figures for the RECORD.

Mr. CAPEHART. I did not say that, at all; I merely said that when the figures were compiled, they were given from memory, and were not taken from the actual records; and I see nothing to be lost by holding up the figures for several hours, until the actual facts can be determined.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I shall hold them up; but I believe that sooner or later the actual figures should be placed in the RECORD, because I quoted the figures in my brief remarks on Monday, and the bill has since been changed, and I asked for a revision. These are the revised figures; and now we shall get the latest edition.

Mr. CAPEHART. No one wishes to keep the figures out of the RECORD. We want them to go into the RECORD. But we would like to make sure about them.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I understand that consent was given to my request to have printed in the RECORD the report by the Treasury Department on indirect obligations, and also the report on authorized borrowings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. CAPEHART subsequently said: Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement I have prepared as to the effects upon the Treasury of the money to be provided in the bill, and two charts prepared for me by the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Indiana a question? Is this the corrected copy the Senator from Virginia was talking about this morning?

Mr. CAPEHART. These are the corrected figures, based upon a close analysis of the bill, which it was not possible to make until yesterday afternoon, when final action was had on the bill by the committee.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Does the Senator have an extra copy, which we may use on this side of the aisle?

Mr. CAPEHART. There are plenty of copies available. I thought a copy had been placed on every desk. If not, I will see that the Senator gets one.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We do not seem to have a copy. I should like very much to have one.

Mr. CAPEHART. There is supposed to be a copy on each desk.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask that the colloquy and the insertions in the RECORD be printed at the appropriate place in the discussion. It occurs to me that about an hour ago we were discussing this matter, and that would be a proper place for the insertion.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. Even beyond that, the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from North Dakota were engaged in an exchange about 10 or 15 minutes ago. It would seem to me to be well to have the insertion in the RECORD made at that point.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this colloquy and the insertions be printed in the RECORD at the appropriate point earlier in the discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana?

There being no objection, the statement and charts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAPEHART

On behalf of myself and others, I shall offer 10 amendments to Senate bill 57, the housing bill.

The purpose of some of these amendments is simply to make the bill more workable from an administration standpoint. Most important, however, are amendments dealing with appropriations and authorizations and their effect on the fiscal affairs of this country.

To begin with, I doubt if ever before there has been proposed legislation before the Congress about which there has been as much misunderstanding and as many unfactual statements as there are on this bill.

The facts about this bill with respect to its draining effect on the U.S. Treasury and on the budget are as follows, based on estimates of the officials of our housing agencies who have all of the facts:

1. If Senate bill 57 is passed as reported from the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, the drain on the Treasury would be approximately $240 million in fiscal 1960.

2. If the Senate accepts the amendments which I will offer, the drain on the Treasury will be only approximately $5 million.

My position is that because of the tremendous demand on the Treasury for money from every direction, we can well afford to reduce proposed new projects and authorizations to lesser amounts without hindering our housing program.

The largest item in the bill is for urban renewal and constitutes more than $2 billion of the $2,900,000,000.

This program, of course, was first approved in the housing law of 1949 but was not actually activated until the housing law of 1954 under the Eisenhower administration.

Specifically, the more important reductions proposed in my amendments are:

To eliminate any new authorizations for public housing because we already have sufficient authorizations to finance this program for the next 12 months and because we still have 115,000 units not completed or occupied.

To eliminate $300 million in direct loans to veterans.

This proposal is based on the almost unanimous opinions of those who have studied the situation and are in a position to know the facts that the proposed increase in the interest rates on veterans loans to 5¼ percent will provide the realistic incentive under which private institutions will absorb all VA mortgages.

AWARD TO SENATOR MUNDT BY INTERNATIONAL HOUSE OF NEW YORK

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, on January 27, 1959, there was an impressive ceremony held here at Washington at which our distinguished colleague the the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] was given an award by International House of New York. I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a press release covering these proceedings, including therein the citation to the Senator from South Dakota.

There being no objection, the press release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C.—International House of New York today honored Senator KARL MUNDT, of South Dakota, for his service in initiating the Smith-Mundt Act in 1948. The citation was presented by Mr. Howard A. Cook, president, and signed by Mr. John J. McCloy, chairman of the board of trustees.

Former Senator H. Alexander Smith of New Jersey was previously honored at an awards dinner held in New York City in November. MUNDT was unable to attend the New York dinner and received the citation today in special ceremonies at the Capitol.

The citations to Smith and MUNDT were part of a 10-year anniversary observance held by International House.

International House is a residence and program center for graduate students studying in New York City as part of the educational exchange programs. The Smith-Mundt Act established the cooperative exchange program between the United States and foreign countries. Voice of America was also established by the Smith-Mundt legislation.

Attending the award luncheon today were representatives of the United States Information Agency, the Department of State, International House, and other organizations which have contributed to the success of exchange programs.

The citation to Senator MUNDT reads:

"Devoted from birth to South Dakota, yet widely traveled in Europe and the Middle East, active exponent of fraternal relations, academic and nonacademic, promoter of the art of effective debate as teacher, organizer and national president of the National Forensic League, champion of conservation, U.S. Senator from South Dakota, during the last 10 years after an equal number of years of energetic service in the U.S. House of Representatives, benefactor to international education as author of the congressional resolution of 1945 which led to the formation of the U.S. Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization:

"In honor of your crucial service 10 years ago in initiating the Smith-Mundt Act, the general basic authority for a cooperative exchange program between the United States and other countries, International House expresses in this citation our warm and deep appreciation on behalf of the world of students and scholars."

The text of Mr. Cook's remarks in presenting the citation follows:

"Last fall, Senator MUNDT, you will recall that I issued an invitation to you and Senator Smith to attend a dinner in your honor in New York City so that the trustees and students of International House could honor you for your work in the exchange-of-persons program.

"We thought it was particularly appropriate because 1958 was the 10th anniversary year of the Smith-Mundt Act. At that time we had a very nice presentation. Senator Smith was there with 11 Smith-Mundt students who were living at International House and it was a gala occasion and we missed you.

"In fact, we are very sorry you couldn't be there. On the other hand, it's fortunate in some regards because it makes possible this particular meeting with this wonderful group here who all have very firm convictions about the importance of the exchange-of-persons program.

"It seems to me that by initiating this act, you and Senator Smith added a new dimension to our foreign policy by helping to increase the number of students and scholars and leaders coming to the United States to study and enabling others to go abroad. Because this legislation has been so important, together with other acts; the Fulbright Act and the many private acts, International House felt that it would like to honor you and Senator Smith for your work in this field.

"And it's a great pleasure for me at this time to present this citation to you on behalf of the board of trustees and students at International House."

Acceptance remarks of Senator MUNDT follows (excerpts):

"I think each of us (Senator Smith and Senator MUNDT) feels that probably numbered among the things which we have achieved or hope to achieve * * * we rank right at the top the passage of the Smith-Mundt Act.

"And we believe, and I know you believe that * * * the cementing of human relations * * * is the best weapon for peace that we have. An ancient philosopher one time said that the many you don't like are the many you don't know, and I think people like Americans when they come to know them and that Americans find that people in other countries have a great many more similarities than they have dissimilarities.

"If we can cement and harness those similarities in international understanding, I think we can ultimately avert permanently * * * war."

IMPORTS OF CERTAIN WOOL PRODUCTS

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that the National Wool Growers Convention meeting in Oregon on January 29 adopted unanimously a resolution, which has been sent to me by telegram, through the courtesy of Mr. R. A. Smiley, president of the Western South Dakota Sheep Growers Association.

The telegram reads as follows:

We are advised Treasury Department rescinding countervailing duties on imports subsidized wool tops from Uruguay. Available trade information indicates subsidization these exports requiring countervailing action under section 303 our Tariff Act has not been eliminated. This action will further weaken wool market which is already depressed to lowest point in 17 years. We therefore urge your assistance in having Secretary of Treasury defer action until industry can be heard and facts developed. Unless prevented this action will undoubtedly increase cost of National Wool Act.

R. A. SMILEY,
President, Western South Dakota Sheep Growers Association.

May I simply add that the producers of wool, lamb, and sheep products have been having tremendous and growing difficulties as a result of importations. I think the request of the woolgrowers' association is very pertinent, plausible, and persuasive, when they simply ask the right to be heard before a change is made which will result in a still further increase in the imports of wool.

CODE OF ETHICS FOR HOLDERS OF PUBLIC OFFICE IN NEW YORK CITY

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the proposed code of ethics for city employees and city legislators of the city of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the news story relating to it, as well as the text of the code from today's New York Times, be made a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article and code were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 4, 1959]

NEW ETHICS CODE FOR PUBLIC OFFICE SUBMITTED TO CITY—COUNCIL COMMITTEE DEFINES CONFLICTS OF INTEREST—CIVIL PENALTIES URGED

(By Charles G. Bennett)

All 225,000 officials and employees of New York City would be held to rigid standards of conduct under a new code of ethics proposed yesterday.

Along with the new code there would be a complete revision of the conflict-of-interest provisions—section 886 of the city charter.

The new section 886 would seek to clarify conflicts of interest, make specific the provisions now considered vague and reduce the likelihood of improper practices by city officers and employees.

The code of ethics was unveiled yesterday by the city council as the result of a 2-year study of its six-man special committee on standards and ethics. Councilman Morris J. Stein, Brooklyn Democrat, is chairman of the committee.

HEARING SET ON FEBRUARY 19

S. Stanley Kreutzer served as counsel to the committee. Mr. Kreutzer described the new program yesterday as "the first general municipal ethics code of its kind in the United States."

Mayor Wagner also hailed the code as representing largely his views of assuring and maintaining fitness for public service in New York City.

[From the New York Times, Feb. 4, 1959]

TEXT OF THE PROPOSED CODE OF ETHICS FOR THE CITY'S EMPLOYEES

(Following are the essential portions of a proposed amendment to sec. 886 of the New York City Charter defining conflicts of interest for city officers and employees. Also, the complete texts of three local laws that would establish a code of ethics for all city employees, set up a board of ethics and restrict the appearances before city agencies of former employees. All were made public yesterday.)

AN ACT TO AMEND THE NEW YORK CITY CHARTER, IN RELATION TO CONFLICTS OF INTEREST

The people of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. Section 886 of the New York City Charter is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 886. Conflicts of interests prohibited.

"(1) No councilman or other officer, employee or person whose compensation or salary is payable in whole or in part from the city treasury—

"(a) shall or become interested directly or indirectly in any manner whatsoever except by operation of law in any business dealings with the city;

"(b) shall act as attorney, agent, broker or employee for any person, firm or corporation interested directly or indirectly in any manner whatsoever in business dealings with the city;

"(c) shall accept any gift, service, loan, thing or promise of value from any person, firm or corporation which, to his knowledge, is interested directly or indirectly in any manner whatsoever in business dealings with the city;

"(d) shall represent private interests before any city agency;

"(e) shall appear as attorney or counsel or give opinion or evidence against the interests of the city in any litigation to which the city is a party.

"(2) As used in this section, the words 'business dealings' shall mean—

"(a) any contract, work or business with the city, or the performance of or litigation arising out of or involving any such contract, work or business, or the sale or acquisition of any property, the expense, price of consideration for which is payable to or from the city treasury or by any assessment levied pursuant to law;

"(b) or the purchase, lease, rental or letting of, or grant of license or permit in relation to, any real or other property belonging to or taken by the city, or which shall be sold for taxes or assessments, or by virtue of legal process or any provision of law by or at the suit of the city.

"(3) This section shall not be construed—

"(a) to prohibit a councilman or other officer or employee from being affiliated with, employed by, or representing a person, firm, or corporation whose business dealings with the city form an insubstantial part of its total business: Provided, That he has no direct or indirect interest in such business dealings and receives no part of the benefits thereof and takes no active part in connection therewith;

"(b) to prohibit a councilman or other officer or employee from appearing before any agency upon matters only incidentally requiring official action which do not develop into a substantial part of the employment: Provided, That he has not been retained for the purpose of appearing before the agency; Provided further, That the compensation in whole or in part is not contingent or dependent upon action by such agency;

"(c) to prohibit a councilman from appearing without compensation before any city department or agency in behalf of constituents or in the performance of public, official, or civic obligations.

"(4) For the purpose of this section, the word 'agency' shall include the New York City Housing Authority and the Triborough Bridge and Tunnel Authority.

"(5) Any violation of any of the provisions of this section shall, at the option of the controller, render forfeit and void the contract, work, business, sale, or transaction affected.

"(6) Any violation of any of the provisions of this section shall constitute cause for fine, suspension, or removal from office or employment.

"(7) If, however, any person shall knowingly and intentionally violate any of the provisions of this section, he shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit his office and be punished for a misdemeanor."

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect immediately.

A LOCAL LAW TO AMEND THE ADMINISTRATIVE CODE OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK IN RELATION TO A CODE OF ETHICS

Be it enacted by the council as follows:

SECTION 1. Chapter 40 of the Administrative Code of the City of New York is hereby amended by adding thereto a new section to follow section 897.1–0 to be section 898.1–0, to read as follows:

"SEC. 898.1–0. Code of ethics.

"(a) Conflicts of interest: No councilman or other officer or employee, whether paid or unpaid, shall engage in any business or transaction or shall have a financial or other private interest, direct or indirect, which is in conflict with the proper discharge of his official duties.

"(b) Representing private interests before city agencies: No councilman or other officer or employee whose salary is paid in whole or in part from the city treasury shall appear in behalf of private interests before any agency, including the New York City Transit Authority, the New York City Housing Authority, and the Triborough Bridge and Tunnel Authority. Councilmen, however, may appear without compensation in behalf of constitutents, or in the performance of public or civic obligations.

"This section shall not prohibit appearances upon matters only incidentally requiring official action which do not develop into a substantial part of the employment, provided that the retainer is not for the purpose of appearing before the agency, and provided further that the compensation, in whole or in part, is not contingent or dependent upon the action of such agency.

"No person serving the city without compensation shall appear, either directly or indirectly, on behalf of private interests in matters involving the agency which he serves or before any agency of the city affecting matters involving the agency in which he serves or in any representative capacity against the interests of the city.

"(c) Representing private interests before courts: No councilman or other officer of employee, whether paid or unpaid, shall represent private interests in any action or proceeding against the interests of the city, in any litigation to which the city, the New York City Transit Authority, the New York City Housing Authority or the Triborough Bridge and Tunnel Authority is a party.

"(d) Disclosure by councilman of interest in legislation: A councilman who has a direct or indirect financial or other private interest in any proposed legislation shall publicly disclose, on the official records of the council, the nature and extent of such interest.

"(e) Disclosure by officer or employee of interest in legislation: An officer or employee who, whether paid or unpaid, has a direct or indirect financial or other private interest in any legislation, and who participates in discussion before or gives official opinion to the council, the board of estimate, or the mayor, shall publicly disclose on the official record the nature and extent of such interest.

"(f) Gifts and favors: No councilman or other officer or employee, whether paid or unpaid, shall accept any valuable gift, service, loan, thing, or promise from any person, firm, or corporation with whom or with respect to whom he, or to his knowledge, the city has business dealings, or regarding whom he has the power to take official action.

"(g) Disclosure of confidential information: No councilman or other officer or employee, whether paid or unpaid, shall disclose confidential information concerning the property, Government or affairs of the city. Nor shall he use such information to advance the financial or other private interest of himself or others.

"(h) Investments in conflict with official duties: No councilman or other officer or employee, whether paid or unpaid, shall invest, or hold any investment directly or indirectly in any financial, business, commercial or other private transaction, which creates a conflict with his official duties.

"(i) Incompatible employment: No councilman or other officer or employee, whether paid or unpaid, shall engage in or accept private employment or render services for private interests when such employment or service is incompatible with the proper discharge of his official duties.

"(j) Future employment: No councilman or other officer or employee, whether paid or unpaid, shall solicit, negotiate for, or promise to, accept employment, by any person, firm or corporation with which he or his agency is engaged on behalf of the city in the transaction of business or which is or may be affected by his official action."

SEC. 2. Any violation of any of the provisions of this section shall constitute cause for fine, suspension or removal from office or employment.

SEC. 3. This local law shall take effect immediately.

A LOCAL LAW TO AMEND THE ADMINISTRATIVE CODE OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK IN RELATION TO THE BOARD OF ETHICS

Be it enacted by the council as follows:

SECTION 1. The administrative code is hereby amended by adding thereto a new section, to follow section B 1–6.0 to be section B 1–7.0 to read as follows:

"SEC. B 1–7.0. Board of ethics.

"(a) There is hereby created and established a board of ethics to consist of the corporation counsel, the director of personnel and three public members to be appointed by the mayor who shall be domiciled in the city of New York, who shall serve without compensation. The public members shall each serve for a term of 4 years. The members shall elect a chairman.

"(b) The board shall render advisory opinions to officers and employees, with respect to section 898.1–0 of the administrative code of the city of New York. Such advisory opinions shall be rendered pursuant to written request by the officer or employee concerned. The board shall publish its advisory opinions with such deletions as may be necessary to prevent disclosure of the identity of the officer or employee involved."

SEC. 2. This local law shall take effect immediately.

A LOCAL LAW TO AMEND THE ADMINISTRATIVE CODE OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, IN RELATION TO APPEARANCES BEFORE CITY AGENCIES OF FORMER OFFICERS OR EMPLOYEES

Be it enacted by the council as follows:

Section 1, chapter 40 of the administrative code of the city of New York is hereby amended by adding thereto a new section, to follow section 896.1–0, to be section 897.1–0, to read as follows:

"SEC. 897.1–0. Appearances before city agencies of former officers or employees. No person who has served as officer or employee of the city shall within a period of 2 years after termination of such service or employment appear before any agency of the city or receive compensation for any services rendered on behalf of any person, firm, corporation or association in relation to any case, proceeding or application with respect to which such person was directly concerned, or in which he personally participated during the period of his service or employment, or which was under his active consideration or with respect to which knowledge or information was made available to him during the period of said service or employment. Any violation of this section shall be a misdemeanor."

SEC. 2. This local law shall take effect immediately.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that New York State has pioneered in codes of ethics or conflicts of interest which relate to legislators, as well as to executive department employees.

The State of New York has such a code, and I have outlined that code in introducing legislation for a Federal code; but the city of New York has come along with a code developed by a man whom I used extensively when I was attorney general—counsel for the New York City Council, S. Stanley Kreutzer.

I should like to invite the attention of the Congress, Mr. President, to the fact that the New York City Code requires a councilman—that is, a member of our city legislative body—who has a direct or indirect financial or other private interest in any proposed legislation, to publicly disclose on the official records of the council the nature and extent of such interest.

Mr. President, I think that is a very interesting and very important contribution in the field of how to deal with conflicts of interest; to wit, public disclosure even on the part of those in legislatures, such as the Senate.

Secondly, there is a prohibition against the acceptance of any valuable gift, service, loan, thing, or promise from any person, firm, or corporation with whom or with respect to whom he, or to his knowledge, the city has business dealings, or regarding whom he has the power to take official action.

I think that, too, is a very excellent guideline for the Congress of the United States and for the executive departments of the Federal Government.

Finally, the code creates a board of ethics, consisting of the principal legal officer of the city of New York, the director of personnel, and three public members appointed by the mayor. The board is empowered to give advisory opinions.

Mr. President, it seems to me these are excellent precedents for conflict-of-interest laws. Again I say I hope very much the Congress will take its duty seriously, will exercise its responsibility upon the highest level in this regard, and will act, and act promptly, upon an effective code of ethics to deal with conflicts of interest. The code which we adopted is a kind of decalog of good conduct, but it is not one effectively, directly, and specifically dealing with conflicts of interest. This is the real question which plagues the Congress. It is the real question the Congress must solve in order to give the people of the country confidence that we are meeting a national issue in the proper way.

My colleague who is waiting to be recognized, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], is the chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration. I know the Senator is very much interested in this particular subject, and I commend to him the reading of this new effort on a governmental level to deal with the problem.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I will say to the distinguished Senator from New York that I am indeed most interested in the suggestions he has made before the Senate this morning with respect to the code of ethics. I read in the New York Times of this morning, I believe, of the New York State Code. I assure the Senator this is a matter of great interest, and it will have our serious consideration.

JUVENILE WORK AT HIGHFIELDS RECEIVES NATIONAL ATTENTION

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, all in this Chamber are concerned with the rising number of crimes committed by the juveniles in this Nation. The U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare tells us that 40,000 youngsters are now in the custody of the law in reformatories or correctional schools. Approximately 1 million teenagers will be brought before the courts for delinquency this year alone. The New York Times, in July of last year, conducted a survey, the results of which indicated that delinquency is not limited to big cities. The writers said there were definite indications of an increase in youthful crime in New York City suburbs.

These are sobering facts. I am particularly happy, therefore, that a national television network has, within the past 2 weeks, given the public important facts about the delinquency problem and about the work of an unusual rehabilitation project, the Highfields Residence Center for Delinquents in Hopewell, N.J.

Highfields is operated by the New Jersey State Division of Correction and Parole. Small groups of boys are sent there because they have taken a turn toward delinquency. At Highfields, they meet in a group, an hour and a half each night, 5 nights a week, during their 4-month stay. They talk over their problems under the guidance of a trained leader. Eight out of ten boys, after they leave Highfields, have stayed out of trouble.

The CBS television network, in programs January 18 and January 25, described the delinquency problem on its "The 20th Century" series. Their documentary programs gave a greater understanding of the work at Highfields. The programs also made a very important point. As expressed in words used on the program:

> Delinquents are children who don't feel good about themselves. Their lack of self-esteem is reflected in a lack of respect toward others.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, is morning business concluded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is concluded.

HOUSING ACT OF 1959

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 38, Senate bill 57, the Housing Act of 1959.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 57) to extend and amend laws relating to the provision and improvement of housing and the renewal of urban communities, and for other purposes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, it has often been said that politics is the art of the possible and that the legislative process is the art of compromise.

The bill now taken up illustrates the wisdom of these observations.

As the debate develops on the Housing Act of 1959, Senators will note that the bill is under attack from the right and the left—that it will be described as inflationary on the one hand and repressive on the other.

The Senate will be reminded, on the one hand, that there is an anticipated deficit of $12 billion for fiscal 1959, and, on the other, that there was an election in 1958. I acknowledge the truth of both these statements. In reply to the first, I should say that the bill has an insignificant effect on the 1959 budget, that it does provide for increased Federal expenditures in subsequent fiscal years not out of line with housing needs—and housing needs, I should emphasize, are basic human needs.

As to the latter statement—that there was an election in 1958—I should remind my colleagues, who will make this argument, that there was no presidential election in 1958. Furthermore, there will not be another one until 1960—nor a new President until 1961. There is every indication that in the meantime the present incumbent of the Presidency is aware of his veto power, and not averse to using it. It may be, of course, that some people would welcome a veto of the pending bill.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will my friend yield to me?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KUCHEL. I have as great respect for the able Senator from Arkansas as I have for any other Member of the Senate. I was wondering what the authority was for his statement that the Chief Executive would utilize the veto power.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If the Senator will listen, I will repeat what I said. I think he misunderstood what I said.

Mr. KUCHEL. That may well be.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. There is every indication that in the meantime the present incumbent of the Presidency is aware of his veto power, and not averse to using it.

I did not say that he would veto the pending bill. I do not believe he would veto the bill before us. However, I think he would be tempted to veto it with some of the amendments being proposed.

Mr. KUCHEL. In other words, what the Senator is saying is that the Chief Executive is aware of his constitutional responsibility.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Exactly.

Mr. KUCHEL. As each of his predecessors was concerning the President's constitutional rights and duties.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Exactly; and that he would use the veto power if the bill should get too far out of line with his thinking.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not think he would veto the bill before us. I believe he would veto it if it were greatly inflated by amendments. I think the Senator will realize that that is the point I was trying to make.

Personally, I am more concerned with accomplishing work and meeting needs in the light of the practicalities, than with creating issues. Furthermore, I believe the American people are intelligent enough to realize the difference between a practical approach to housing needs and a political gesture.

I hope Senators will support the Sparkman bill without substantial amendment.

Mr. President, as this is very likely the last bill which will be reported to the Senate by the Banking and Currency Committee while I am chairman, and as it is a housing bill, I wish to take this opportunity to commend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] for his devoted efforts in behalf of housing.

No Member of this body knows more about housing than does the Senator from Alabama. No other Senator knows as much about the history of housing, housing needs, and what should be done about housing. As Senators know, he has carried the chief burden, the housing legislation, for the committee for many years. This bill can be defended on that basis, if upon no other. But, as usual, it is a good bill, not only because of his mark upon it, but because of the efforts he has put into it this year, as well as his efforts during the hearings last year.

The chairmanship of the Committee on Banking and Currency has been an interesting assignment for me, and I am reluctant to give up the position. However, I congratulate the Senate and the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency upon their good fortune in having such an experienced and competent member as the junior Senator from Virginia to take over the chairmanship of that committee.

The junior Senator from Virginia came to the Senate in 1946, after many years' experience in the House of Representatives, where I served with him in 1943 and 1944. He is one of the best informed Members of this body on all aspects of banking legislation. His financial institutions bill of the last Congress, for example, was a monumental piece of work, encompassing practically all the important financial institutions of the country. He recommended to the Senate, and the Senate accepted, many important improvements in those institutions.

I believe the junior Senator from Virginia could be characterized as an enlightened conservative. He is not likely to lead the Senate into any radical or unworkable schemes. The Senate and the country can take much comfort from that prospect.

I regret very much giving up the chairmanship of such a fine committee, but my regret is softened by the fact that the position will pass into such competent hands.

I take this opportunity to thank all the members of the committee, and especially the members of the committee staff. It is a very fine staff—a professional staff, in the sense of the Reorganization Act, which was passed some years ago. There are many excellent members of that staff. I thank them for their cooperation while I have been chairman, and for the many instances in which they have been of great assistance to me in connection with particular legislation.

This assignment has been a most interesting one. I feel that through it I have learned a great deal about the business life of our Nation. I learned a great deal that I certainly did not previously know about some of the most complex aspects of the great country which we serve in this body.

I wish Godspeed to the junior Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the junior Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I am glad to yield to the distinguished junior Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. No one could be more grateful than I am for the very gracious, kind, and flattering remarks which our distinguished chairman has made concerning the ranking Democratic member who is scheduled shortly to succeed him as chairman.

The junior Senator from Virginia is proud, of course, of the honor which will come to him in succeeding to the chairmanship of a great committee. However, he can say in all sincerity that the junior Senator from Virginia and every other member of that committee sincerely regret that we are to lose as chairman our distinguished colleague from Arkansas.

The junior Senator from Virginia has served under three chairmen, two of them Democrats, and one Republican. He is engaging in no invidous comparisons when he says that the legislative program of the past 4 years, enacted under the leadership of the distinguished chairman, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] has never been surpassed during that 12 year period.

The work of the committee has not only been fair, but it has also been characterized by great harmony. The last 4 years of that work have set an example which the junior Senator from Virginia will do his best to emulate, by handling the work of the committee efficiently and maintaining the fine relationships which have been established between the parties and all of those on the committee who have different economic views.

Again I wish to congratulate the Nation and the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the type of outstanding man in the field of foreign relations who is to head that committee, and again to express our genuine regret that we will lose him.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, first I ask unanimous consent that during the consideration of the housing bill, two additional members of the staff of the Committee on Banking and Currency be permitted to be with us on the floor in order to assist us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPARKMAN. With reference to the remarks which have just been made by the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Virginia, I wish to join in what the Senator from Virginia has said regarding the fine leadership and cooperation and help all of us on the Committee on Banking and Currency have received from the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT]. I came to the committee at the same time the Senator from Virginia became a member, and we have served under the same chairmanships. First there was the late Senator Tobey, from New Hampshire; then the late and beloved Senator Maybank, of South Carolina; then the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART]; and then the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT]. We had fine leadership during all those years.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, before any false impression is created, I wish to say that I am not leaving the committee.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I realize that.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not want that impression to be created.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We fully understand that. The Senator will notice that I have always referred to the chairmanship, not to the membership of the committee. Certainly we shall continue to have the advice and help and leadership of the Senator from Arkansas. We shall continue to have his assistance as a member of the committee even though he is giving up the chairmanship.

I wish to join the Senator from Arkansas in what he said in welcoming to the chairmanship which the Senator from Arkansas is vacating, our distinguished colleague, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], who has sat between us in the committee meetings during all these years. I know that we will continue to have the same type of leadership and cooperation.

I particularly wish to commend the Senator from Virginia for the outstanding work he has done. He has carried a good part of the terrific load of the work which comes to the Committee on Banking and Currency every year. As a matter of fact, I believe that the Financial Institutions Act, which the Senate passed in the last Congress, was one of the most monumental works ever undertaken by that committee. That was done under the very close leadership and direction of the Senator from Virginia.

I express my appreciation to the Senator from Arkansas for the remarks he has made regarding me. I have had his leadership and cooperation and his help, as I have had of every member of the Housing Subcommittee, and, indeed, of the full Banking and Currency Committee.

I also agree with what he said about the harmonious operation of the committee. We have our differences, but we thrash them out in committee, and we work together very well. I am delighted to note that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] will continue to be a member of the Banking and Currency Committee.

Finally, I wish to say that I enjoy another association which not all of the members of the Banking and Currency Committee can enjoy, and that is that I will still be serving under the chairmanship of the Senator from Arkansas while he is chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I look forward to that association with a great deal of interest.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The junior Senator from Virginia wishes to express his deep appreciation for the kind references to him made by the distinguished Senator from Alabama. Concerning the program the Senator from Virginia anticipates after our friend from Arkansas gives up the chairmanship of the Banking and Currency Committee, the junior Senator from Virginia was asked if he planned any realinement of subcommittees. He said certainly he did not. For instance, he said, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Housing, we have the best posted man on housing on the whole committee, and that in no circumstances would he want to change that chairmanship. The subcommittees will remain the same. The staff will be the same, except that there will be some realinement of duties.

We mean to carry on, as the junior Senator from Virginia has said before, as the Senator from Arkansas has carried on, in a spirit of harmony. Everyone will be given the privilege of expressing his views. The majority will prevail on the legislation which is reported by the committee. The chairman hopes that he will find himself in line with the majority on many issues. If he does not, he hopes there will be no hard feelings. On the floor every Member will vote his convictions, and there will be no hard feelings toward those who differ.

Again the prospective chairman congratulates the chairman of the Subcommittee on Housing. Among the principal activities of the committee will be legislation in the fields of housing and small business. The Senator from Alabama is outstanding in both those fields, and certainly at the present time they are very important fields. We look forward to the handling of housing legislation as it has been handled in the past.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I should like to add one further word with reference to what the Senator has said about the staff of the Committee on Banking and Currency. Capitol Hill is fortunate to have many good staffs, but I say with full confidence in my statement that no committee has a finer staff than does the Committee on Banking and Currency. It is a staff which has been continued from one chairmanship to another, except as some members of the staff have withdrawn or gone on to private work of some kind. We have an outstanding staff, and I wish to compliment it, and at the same time express my gratitude for the fine help the members of the staff have given to us throughout the years.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to speak on the pending housing bill. I shall not speak at great length, although I shall be glad to reply to any questions which may be asked. I simply wish to touch on some of the high points. I realize that I may omit discussing some things in which some Senators may be particularly interested, although I shall not do so purposely. But I shall touch on the parts which I believe may be of the most interest to the greater number of the Members of this body.

First, Mr. President, let me say, as I have previously stated here on the floor, that the bill the committee has reported is a reasonable one. Furthermore, as I have also stated even about the bill I introduced, although the bill now before the Senate is not the bill I originally introduced, nevertheless the pending bill follows it largely, but excludes, on the one hand, some provisions which the committee thought should be omitted; and includes, on the other, some provisions which the committee thought should be incorporated.

However, by and large the pending bill is the same as the bill I introduced earlier in the session; and, as I have so often said, the pending bill is essentially the bill the Senate passed last year. Last year our committee reported a rather comprehensive housing bill, which came to the floor of the Senate; and on the floor a compromise was worked out. The compromise was fully entered into by Members of the Senate on both sides of the aisle. The distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the ranking minority member of the full Banking and Currency Committee, and also of the housing subcommittee, participated in the working out of that compromise, which ended in the passage of the bill by the Senate.

The bill I introduced this year was almost identical with that one. There were a few changes, but only in cases in which it was felt it was necessary to make changes in order to take care of obligations which had piled up since that time. For instance, last year it was agreed here that $150 million additional should be placed in the revolving fund for direct loans to veterans. That figure was set as a result of information which had been given to our committee by the Veterans' Administration—namely, that that much additional money would be required in order to take care of the backlog which had developed up to that time.

This year, when I introduced the bill, instead of providing for $150 million, I provided $300 million—again because of information which came to us from the Veterans' Administration to the effect that a sizable backlog had built up. That is one of the changes the committee made.

Other changes were made, but all of them were very much along that line, that is, to bring the bill up to date. For example, $10 million was provided under section 701 of the bill to provide money for the smaller cities and towns, to assist them in planning their public works and their urban renewal programs.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point, before he leaves the subject of direct loans?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Was the $300 million item in the bill reduced to $200 million by the committee?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; it remained at $300 million.

Mr. ROBERTSON. There was some discussion about it; but it remained at $300 million?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. The Senator from Virginia was not able to be present at the time we considered that particular item, but I think he will be interested in knowing of a certain development which had taken place in the House of Representatives. The House Veterans' Affairs Committee had provided for authority to increase interest rates of VA guaranteed loans from the present 4¾ percent to 5½ percent and, coupled with that, had increased the revolving fund for direct loans, by $300 million.

The Senator from Virginia is aware of the jurisdictional difficulty in dealing with this question in the House. Jurisdiction in the House is divided between two committees, the Veterans' Affairs Committee and the Banking and Currency Committee.

I may say to the Senator from Virginia that our committee agreed to write into our bill the exact wording of the House committee approved bill dealing with this subject, in the hope that if the two Houses of Congress passed identical bills there would be no jurisdictional difficulty this year.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I should like to ask the Senator one other question. Was there any change in the bill of the Senator from Alabama with respect to VA loans that could be used for rural loans that are not now covered?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would not say they are not now covered, but they are not covered with sufficient funds.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am glad the Senator has raised that point, because it may be that some Senators do not understand that the original law, as I recall it, provided that the loan shall be made only to credit-worthy veterans who live in rural or semirural areas where funds otherwise are not available.

I wish to say, in all frankness, that if we increase the interest rates of VA-guaranteed loans to 5¼ percent, I am of the opinion it will cut down some of the backlog. The full $300 million may not be required to remove the backlog. However, if funds are not required, they will not be used. The funds can be used only in rural or semirural areas to take care of credit-worthy veterans who are unable to get the money otherwise.

Mr. President, I wish to point out there has been a great deal of talk about how large the amount covered by the bill is and how greatly it differs from the administration bill. As a matter of fact, over the radio this morning I heard a commentator say that our bill asked for three times what the administration requested.

Mr. President, that just is not the case. I bring the matter up at this time to point out that the biggest single difference—certainly so far as cash is involved—between the bill which the committee reported and the bill which the administration proposed, is this very item of $300 million to provide loans for veterans who live in areas, all over this country, where mortgage money is not available, in order to give them an opportunity to share in a program of decent housing. This has been one of the most successful programs we have had in the whole field of housing. I have stated this many, many times on the floor of the Senate and in committee that I am rather reluctant to state it again, but the idea behind the introduction of this program of direct VA loans, when I introduced it back in 1950, as I recall, was presented to me by a banker who called attention to the fact that in the smaller communities, towns, and outlying areas, local lenders simply could not take care of veterans who were entitled to decent homes, because mortgage money was not available in such areas.

As a result of the suggestion by the banker, I had a bill prepared. There was some difficulty in getting it passed the first time, but after the program worked for a few years and experience was gained therefrom, we have had no trouble in extending the program from time to time and, in addition, when more moneys were needed for the revolving fund, such moneys were added. This VA direct loan program is one of the best programs we have had. The rate of delinquencies in repayment of the loans has been negligible.

Let me make it clear, this is a loan program. There is no grant involved. Every dollar is to be paid back—and with interest. This means the Government will make a profit. If the provision to raise the interest rate to 5¼ percent is enacted by the Congress and signed into law by the President, it means such loans will bear an interest rate of 5¼ percent, because, under the law, VA direct loans carry the same rate of interest as do VA-guaranteed loans.

Certainly, I believe the direct loan program ought to be kept alive.

As of December 31, 1958, the VA had some 50,000 pending applications for direct loans. These applications were filed by veterans throughout the entire Nation.

Mr. President, very recently a veteran living in my State wrote me in connection with this matter. In his letter he said he simply could not understand the situation in the direct loan program. He stated he had had an application on file for perhaps a year or longer, I do not remember how long. He went ahead to say, "They tell me I am No. 1031 on the list."

This is a case of a veteran in my home State. He has no real hope for a loan in the near future under the present loan authorization. This is a revolving fund and, as things presently stand, this veteran has no hope of getting a direct loan for, perhaps, 2 or 3 more years.

All we are attempting to do by providing these additional funds to the revolving fund is to make it possible to eliminate the present backlog of applications now pending. If all the additional money is not needed, it will not be used, and, therefore, will not represent a charge on the budget of the United States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the information which was supplied to the committee by the Veterans' Administration. This information is found on page 625 of the transcript of hearings for this year. The information relates to the VA direct loan program, the backlog of applications for loans, and the additional amount required to satisfy this backlog.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VA DIRECT LOAN PROGRAM

Under this program, the Veterans' Administration is authorized to make direct Federal loans to veterans living in remote areas which are not accessible to the normal channels of mortgage credit. The terms of the loan are comparable to those under the VA loan-guarantee program, but for a maximum amount of $13,500.

STATUS AS OF DEC. 31, 1958

Unencumbered June 30, 1958	$5,000,000
Treasury advance July 1, 1958	50,000,000
Treasury advance Oct. 1, 1958	50,000,000
Principal repayments anticipated July 1, 1958, to Dec. 31, 1958	22,000,000
Total available July 1 to Dec. 31, 1958	127,000,000
Loaned or committed (estimated)	127,000,000
Unencumbered balance as of Dec. 31, 1958 (negligible).[1]

BACKLOG AS OF DEC. 31, 1958

Applicants on waiting list:
As of May 29, 1958	30,600
As of June 30, 1958	35,000
As of Dec. 31, 1958	50,000

[1] A new advance of $50 million will be made available on Jan. 1, 1959, in accordance with the Emergency Housing Act which authorized $150 million for fiscal 1959 and 1960.

Because of the lack of funds, the VA refuses to accept any more applications. They so advise the applicant and issue a number which gives him a priority to be effective if and when funds are available. To remove the backlog would require an estimated $300 million. Each potential application is for an average loan of $10,000, making a gross estimated total of $500 million. According to a normal attrition of 40 to 50 percent, the net demand would be $250 million. If these applications were to continue at the present rate until February 1, 1959, a $300 million authorization would be a minimum to eliminate the backlog.

Mr. SPARKMAN. This information relates to the status of the direct loan program as of December 31, 1958, and I desire to read one sentence therefrom:

If these applications were to continue at the present rate until February 1, 1959, a $300 million authorization would be a minimum to eliminate the backlog.

This is not my statement; this is not the statement of the Committee on Banking and Currency; but it is the statement of the Veterans' Administration, which administers this loan program.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. Does the Veterans' Administration, in making the statement which the able Senator has just read, equate the figure with a recommendation for a change in interest rates?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No, it does not. I believe the Senator was present when I replied to a question from the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON].

Mr. KUCHEL. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I said in reply to the question that, frankly, I believe if we increase the interest rates, as S. 57 would provide, it will reduce the need for additional funds to some extent. The reduction would not be great, but increasing the interest rate would cut down the backlog in some areas. Probably the full $300 million would not be required.

I also pointed out that if the additional money is not required, the money will not be made available. This is not an appropriation of a specific amount. Therefore, if the money is not used, there will be no impact on the budget.

Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas made a statement a few minutes ago which I believe we should all bear in mind. This bill has been attacked from one side as being too liberal, as including too much, and as providing too great expenditures or programed outlays. On the other side, the bill has been attacked for not providing enough.

Certainly I can think of some programs I wish we could step up a great deal more than is provided for in this bill. However, I recognize the fact that all of us would like to see a condition come about which will produce a balanced budget. I believe, Mr. President, that we must consider, in connection with this matter, a balanced economy. What we have tried to do in this bill is provide a program which will produce housing.

Practically every statement the administration issues regarding the upturn in the economy—and we all are happy that there has been an upturn—includes something about the upsurge in housing, the tremendous push it has attained over the past several months, and what may be expected during 1959.

Mr. President, in this regard, the Emergency Housing Act of 1958, which we passed in the Senate and which the President signed on the last day under the law he was allowed to sign it—and he signed it grudgingly—is very important. If it had not been for the law enacted during the last session, I suggest the upturn in the economy would not have been anything like we had experienced. The upturn would not have come as early as it did, and certainly the upturn would not have had the great proportion experienced thus far.

Pursuant to the Emergency Housing Act of 1958, I suggest that between 200,000 and 300,000 houses were built which otherwise would not have been built. Surely you agreed this legislation was a good investment. The cost outlay of a billion dollars, from the standpoint of the budget, represented a good investment. There were no grants in this legislation. Not a dime was provided for grants. The legislation provided for a billion dollars for loans, with respect to which the Federal National Mortgage Association made a great deal of money.

That is another thing of which many people lose sight. The Federal housing program, which is the largest part of our housing program, has not cost the Federal Government 1 penny. The several million houses which have been constructed through the medium of FHA financing during the time the agency has been in existence—24 years—have not cost the Government, nor the taxpayer for that matter, any money. The FHA has paid for itself. In addition it has built up a reserve of nearly $700 million.

A moment or so ago I said something about authorizing an additional billion dollars for the Federal National Mortgage Association in the Emergency Housing Act of 1958. I wonder if it is generally known and understood that the Federal National Mortgage Association buys mortgages? These mortgages bear interest and are paid off, and during the time the Federal National Mortgage Association has been in operation, it has made a clear profit of nearly a quarter billion dollars.

When the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] was present I mentioned that one of the changes in the bill which I introduced and in the bill as reported from the committee, as compared with the provisions in the bill which the Senate passed last year, was with respect to the $300 million for direct loans to veterans. I was about to speak of another change in the bill and now contained in the committee bill; namely, the $10 million to enable small cities and towns to make surveys and to do planning in connection with public improvements, public works, urban renewal, and other plans of that type.

In 1954, we provided $5 million for the section 701 program. In 1956, we increased the authorization by an additional $5 million—a total of $10 million.

This program has now been in operation for about 5 years. The authorization is about exhausted. There remains only $975,000 to be appropriated. Nine million twenty-five thousand dollars has been spent or allocated, and $975,000 remains to be appropriated. We thought we ought to add $10 million to that fund, so we put that amount in the committee bill when the administration bill also contained an additional $10 million for this program. So there is no difference between the committee bill and the administration's bill in connection with the authorization for the 701 program.

This additional authorization will cause no immediate impact on the budget, because this item has already been budgeted for 1960; that is the $975,000, the amount which remains in the existing authorization.

It is rather interesting to study the impact of the bill on the budget. A great many people think it would shatter the budget, and break it down. As a matter of fact, it would have virtually no effect upon the budget for 1959, and very little upon the budget for 1960. In fact, if the item for the VA direct loans, that is, the additional $300 million, is not considered as a budget expenditure—and it really should not be carried in the budget, because it is not an expenditure, but a loan, an investment—Senate bill 57, as reported by the committee, is only some $30 million higher than the amount the administration recommended to our committee. I do not believe that most people understand this to be true, but nevertheless, it is.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Pennsylvania, who is one of the hardest and ablest workers on our housing subcommittee.

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend for his kind comment.

I should like to emphasize what the Senator has just said, because I agree with him that the press of the country and the people of the country do not understand what very minor differences there are between Senate bill 57, the bill which the Senator from Alabama has drafted and piloted through the Banking and Currency Committee with such skill, and the administration proposal, which the committee—correctly, in my judgment, at least—rejected.

Is it really true that if we eliminate the $300 million for direct veterans' loans—every cent of which, as the Senator pointed out, will be repaid to the Treasury—the Senator's bill would cost only $30 million more than the administration bill?

Mr. SPARKMAN. In the 1960 budget?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I was only discussing the impact on the 1960 budget, because so much has been said about throwing the budget out of balance.

Mr. CLARK. I invite the Senator's attention to a table which appears on page 61 of the report of the committee. I take it from what he says that that table, which was submitted to the committee by HHFA is not correct, because that would show, as an additional expenditure by reason of Senate bill 57, some $233 million. I was a little skeptical of that table.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think I can explain that. The administration states that if our bill passes as it has been reported, $200 million will be spent for veterans' loans. In other words, the administration estimates that it will not spend the full $300 million, but will spend only $200 million, and that $200 million is included in the administration figure of some $230 million.

Mr. CLARK. The administration makes no distinction between money put out on a loan basis, which will be paid back, and money which is put out as a grant, or an expenditure for services, and does not come back.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator is correct.

I do not direct any criticism at the administration for doing that. The trouble is with our system of bookkeeping. I wish we could devise a new system of bookkeeping for the Federal Government. No business would keep books in the manner in which the Government keeps books. The $1 billion which we made available last year to the Federal National Mortgage Association, with which to buy up mortgages, was invested—every cent—in moneymaking mortgages so far as the Government was concerned. Yet this $1 billion is carried as though it had been spent, never to be recovered.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will yield further, I should like to make the observation that not only would no well-operated business keep its books in the obsolete method utilized by the Federal Government, but no well-operated city does it. Every city of which I have any knowledge whatever—certainly my own city of Philadelphia—has separated its capital budget from its operating budget. I believe that if the Federal Government were to bring its budget procedures into line with those of the majority of well-operated cities in the United States, we would be a great deal better off.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Recently, there was published in one of the national magazines—I believe it was U. S. News & World Report—an article which discussed this very subject; namely, the manner of keeping the Federal Government budget. There was a chart which showed that if there were a division between expenditures—that is, money spent, not to be recovered—and capital investments—that is, the $1 billion in FNMA mortgages, for example—instead of the budget being out of balance this year, it would be balanced, and next year we would have several billion dollars left over.

Mr. AIKEN rose.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator from Vermont seems to have become interested. I made a remark which he may not have caught. I am not saying this in criticism of the administration. What I am saying is that it is most unfortunate that we have the system of bookkeeping which we have—a system which does not take into account such things as investments in home mortgages, which have actually resulted in money being made. A moment ago I gave figures showing that during its operation the FHA had built up a surplus of about $700 million profit, and that the FNMA, during its operation, had built up a profit of about $250 million. Nearly $1 billion has been made in the housing operation by those two agencies alone.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator has answered the question I was about to ask him, with respect to the repayment of the housing loans and the present standing of the Government on the profit and loss statement.

What the Senator is saying, I take it, is that the assets of the Government, and consequently of the taxpayer, are increasing at a much faster rate than the liabilities.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think that is an absolutely sound statement. That does not take into account what has been a very fine and profitable operation in the VA guarantee program, under which mortgages have been handled by the Veterans' Administration, and not necessarily through the Federal National Mortgage Association.

Mr. AIKEN. It is proposed to strike out direct loans to veterans in rural and sparsely settled areas. After a great deal of difficulty some counties were made eligible for loans. But if we must go home and explain to them that, although they were made eligible for loans last year, we have decided not to make any loans at all this year, I am wondering just what the reaction will be. I understand that whether a county is eligible depends on the capital wealth of the county.

Mr. SPARKMAN. On the availability of mortgage money.

Mr. AIKEN. Yes. In some counties there may be a colony of extremely well to do people who, because of their own personal income, would disqualify everyone in the entire county from receiving a direct loan. It makes for a very difficult situation. Most people would still be in favor of direct loans, but, because of the fact that there are a few people living in the county who are well-to-do, the whole county, and all the people living in it, would be disqualified from receiving direct loans. Therefore I am wondering, if provisions for direct loans to veterans living in rural or sparsely settled areas of the country are stricken, how we will be able to explain it to the people when we go home.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Just a little while ago I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement which was based on information obtained from the Veterans' Administration. That information showed that as of December 31, 1958, there was a backlog of 50,000 applications from veterans living in rural and semi-rural areas. The information also showed that if applications continued to be received at the present rate until February 1, 1959, $300 million in authorizations would be the minimum amount that would be required to eliminate the backlog.

Mr. AIKEN. Has the Senator from Alabama any information showing what the record of repayment is on that type of loan? I refer to direct loans in the rural areas. What is the record of repayment of those loans as compared with the repayment of other type of loans?

Mr. SPARKMAN. If that information is not contained in this year's hearings, I know that it was contained in the hearings of last year. It is one of the most remarkable things that has ever been accomplished. I refer to the record of repayment. It was shown then that the cases in default were almost negligible. We must remember that VA loans carry a rate of interest which gives a profit to the U.S. Government.

Mr. AIKEN. Another reason why I have a particular interest in this phase of the loan provisions is that there are so many people who are presently living in undesirable quarters in cities and who would like to get outside the cities and build their homes where they could enjoy better living. If there is no provision for loans for people who wish to acquire land and to build a home in the rural or sparsely settled areas of the country, they will be sentenced to living in those city areas, and perhaps will have to depend on urban renewal to some extent, but under conditions other than those which are preferable and desirable.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have before me a brief statement on that point which was made during the hearings this year. I wish I had a more complete breakdown. However, Mr. William J. Driver, Acting Chief Benefits Director of the Veterans' Administration gave us this testimony:

> To date, nearly 6 percent of the direct loans have been repaid in full; 6 percent have been sold to private investors, and it has been necessary to foreclose on only a little over one-half of 1 percent of the direct loans made.

Mr. AIKEN. I know that the Senator from Alabama has been very much interested in the rural development program, which is designed to make the best possible use of hundreds of thousands of small farms which have become uneconomic, and make the best possible living for the people who live on those farms. If there is no provision made for loans for those rural areas, the little farms will probably grow into brush, and our whole rural development program will be given a setback. That is what is likely to happen if no provision is made for direct loans to veterans in those areas.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I believe the Senator is correct.

Mr. AIKEN. We hear a great deal of talk that, "You can go out and get the money at 5½ or at 5¼ percent." That does not work out that way, however.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It would not matter whether the interest rate were 10 percent. There would still be some areas of the Nation where mortgage money would not be available.

Mr. AIKEN. There are some areas where the small local banks simply cannot provide the means for making those loans. There are other areas where they do not want to bother with them.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I shall repeat something I said a little while ago before the Senator came into the Chamber. I introduced legislation which established the VA direct loan program in 1950. One day I had received a letter from a banker at Tuscumbia, Ala. He was a smalltown banker. He said in his letter, "Our bank has always tried to serve this community. We believe that the veterans who are coming back from service are entitled to share in the housing program." He said, "However, a small bank like this can only carry a small number of mortgages in its portfolio, and we cannot get mortgage investors to come in. I believe that in cases like that the Federal Government ought to provide a direct loan."

Acting on that suggestion I had legislation drawn which, as I have said, I introduced in 1950.

Mr. AIKEN. Some people who object to making direct loans in rural areas might also object because, as they say, "If people build homes 10 miles out of town, we will have to build public roads for them to get them into town, and that will cost money. We may even have to run rural electrification lines out to them, and perhaps even provide schools, or at least make arrangements to transport their children to school." Some people will object to all these things because other people like to raise a family and have a home that is not located in a crowded district in a city, but, instead, a few miles out in the country, where they can walk on land they own and where they can take pride in its ownership and pride in being American citizens.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am glad that the Senator from Vermont made that statement. I agree with him completely.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. There is no question about the fact that both the Senator from Alabama and I, and others, are interested in having GI's get loans to build houses. The question at the moment, as I see it, is whether it is not better—and I believe it is—for them to get their loans through private industry.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. CAPEHART. If the interest rate is going to be the same on direct Government loans and loans from private industry.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes, I agree that I would much rather see it that way.

Mr. CAPEHART. All of us would much rather see that.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Veterans' Affairs Committee of the House has increased the interest rate to 5¼ percent, and the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency has increased the rate to 5¼ percent in the bill which we are considering. I believe it is the best judgment of everyone I have talked to about the subject—and it makes sense to me—that with a 5¼ percent interest rate, there will be more buyers of veterans' mortgages at 5¼ percent than there will be mortgages, whether we are talking about a small town or a big town, because, as the able Senator will agree, a veteran's mortgage, which is guaranteed by the Federal Government—and in case of default is immediately payable in cash—is preferable to an FHA mortgage.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I believe it is.

Mr. CAPEHART. Therefore, I believe the whole argument is based upon the question, under existing conditions, when there is such a great demand for taxpayers' money, and a great demand on the Treasury from every direction, for things needed, whether this is not one of the places where we could, at least for the next few months, see if private industry cannot buy these mortgages and thereby relieve the Treasury of the obligation, and help a little toward balancing our budget and reducing our expenditures. That is the problem. I have not found any member of the committee or anyone else who is not sincere and conscientious in his desire to help the veteran. But the veteran, likewise, is a taxpayer. He, too, wants the Government to have a balanced budget. I think he would prefer to sell his mortgage to private industry than to the Government, because a lot of redtape is involved when he borrows directly from the Government. Therefore, I shall recommend strongly—and shall offer an amendment later to that effect—the elimination of direct loans at this time, and to try out such a procedure for a period of 6 months.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I agree with what the Senator from Indiana says about the desirability of private investors supplying the money for mortgages. Furthermore, I am quite certain that with the interest increase it will be possible to get the VA guaranteed mortgage program off the ground and moving again.

Mr. CAPEHART. As was done a year ago.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I said earlier that I felt an interest rate increase would perhaps cut down the demand for VA direct loans. But there is one item I wish to call to the Senator's attention: First, VA direct home loans cannot be made to any veteran who can get money at any price—not merely at the 5¼-percent rate, but at any price. That is the law. If money is available to the veteran at 6 percent, he cannot come to the Veterans' Administration and say, "I want your mortgage, because otherwise I will have to pay 6 percent." In other words, if the veteran can obtain money, he cannot get a direct loan.

Mr. CAPEHART. Is it the opinion of the able Senator from Alabama, then, that even though we provide for $300 million, if that is the purpose, or $200 million, or $150 million, or even $100 million, very little of it, if any, will be used?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the Senator please restate his question?

Mr. CAPEHART. Is it the Senator's opinion that even though we provide in the bill for $300 million, $200 million, $150 million, $100 million, $50 million, very little of it, if any, will be used as a result of the increase in the interest rate?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let us use the Administration's figures on that. The Administration gives us these figures, which are found on page 61 of the report. If $300 million is voted and the 5¼-percent interest date increase is voted, it is the estimate of the Administration—

Mr. CAPEHART. Is that the Veterans' Administration?

Mr. SPARKMAN. These figures are furnished to us by the Housing Agency. I assume they obtained the figures from the Veterans' Administration. The Housing Agency estimates that there would be $200 million spent on VA direct home loans. That amount is included in the figure which the Senator from Indiana has been using.

Mr. CAPEHART. If it is voted.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. CAPEHART. The reason why we are taking a little time on this subject is that it is one of the items in dispute between the proponents of the bill we are considering and the proponents of the amendment which it is planned to offer.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I had said earlier that this is really the biggest single item of difference. I may have gone too far a while ago when I said "at any price."

Mr. CAPEHART. If we eliminate the $300 million, then the impact or the drain upon the Treasury in the fiscal year 1960, as between the bill which is being considered and the so-called administration bill, would be only about $35 million.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Thirty or thirty-five million dollars; that is correct.

Mr. CAPEHART. That is the only big difference between the proposals. If we could eliminate that item, the only argument then would be over the amount of $30 million or $35 million. There will be other years when there will be differences.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Even then, the difference will not be too great.

Mr. CAPEHART. It will not be too great.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I may have gone too far a while ago when I said "at any price." I would say it does have to be competitive. But if the money is available at a competitive interest rate, then the borrower can get a direct loan.

The second point I wish to make is that in the bill we continue the VHMCP for 2 years. That is the voluntary arrangement whereby private insurance companies, investment bankers, and others, agree to assist in this program. In other words, we are doing everything we can to push private money into these areas. I said earlier that if the demand is not present, the money will not be used. It is not appropriated.

Mr. CAPEHART. We are all trying to keep the budget in balance. If we could eliminate the $300 million, we would be only about $35 million apart, and the proposed legislation would call upon the Treasury for only about $35 million.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CAPEHART. We would not be too far apart, if we could decide simply to eliminate the $300 million, or perhaps reduce the amount to as little as $50 million.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Is the Senator proposing to eliminate the assistance that we give to the country boys?

Mr. CAPEHART. No; I do not agree with the Senator on that.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We would be eliminating from the program assistance to the country boys who are veterans. We would exclude them from loans.

I should like to remind you that this program involves no grants and no cost. The program actually makes money. I am simply not willing to eliminate the country boys. I would much rather eliminate some other phase of the program.

I am much more interested in seeing the veterans out in the country given some opportunity to have decent housing than I am in raising the price level for the finest homes in town to $20,000. I do not think it is right to tell a country boy, who is a veteran of the Second World War or the Korean war, that he cannot have a $10,000 house.

Mr. CAPEHART. Would the Senator be willing to limit the program to veterans who live in the country?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is already limited to rural and semirural areas.

Mr. CAPEHART. Why not limit it to farmers who live in small towns having a population of, say, 2,000 or under? Those are the people we are discussing.

Mr. SPARKMAN. No. The law has been operating well now for 9 years under a definition we all understand, and it relates to rural and semirural areas. It provides credit to veterans who live in rural and semirural areas, and who cannot obtain credit otherwise. I think that is a satisfactory definition, and certainly is sufficiently restrictive.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to contribute first hand knowledge. Vermont is a rural State and would be one of the big losers if direct loans to rural areas were discontinued. The average loan in the rural areas of my State is $6,000. The loan average in the rest of the country is $10,000. If those who are opposed to making loans in rural areas really want to save money for the Government, they should make all loans in rural areas, because they would be making loans of $6,000 instead of $10,000.

I have been reading statements in the newspapers by persons who are opposed to making loans to veterans in rural areas.

I do not see why we should, under any circumstance, discriminate against a veteran who lives in a rural area. To do that would be one of the worst things we could do for the country and one of the worst things we could do for the veterans.

In this connection I would like to ask a question: It is assumed by those who are opposed to rural loans that money will be available at 5¼ percent. Was any assurance given to the committee that the money would be available at 5¼ percent once rural loans were discontinued by the Federal Government?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No. As a matter of fact, the testimony before the committee—I do not remember whether it was in the hearing this year or the hearing last summer—by persons who represent the mortgage bankers and investment people, who chip in and set up a voluntary program, was that in spite of all they would be willing to do, there would still be a need for the direct-loan program.

Mr. AIKEN. Would not the discontinuance of loans in rural areas be an incentive to raising the interest rates to the maximum amount permitted by the States, plus such service charges as might also be made?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Of course, that is true; but I go back to the fact that there is a scarcity of money available in those areas. The largest single lending group in the country, so far as home mortgages are concerned, are the savings and loan associations. I believe they carry a higher percentage of mortgages than any other group. But the FHA-insured and VA-guaranteed mortgage funds are made available by mortgage bankers and large insurance companies and similar large investment funds. Most of these lenders are in New York City, Hartford, Philadelphia, and cities like that. They are not interested in making loans in small rural places. Of course, they do not mind making a loan in Birmingham, Ala., where they probably have their own representatives.

But if I were to ask them to go to Dale County, perhaps, which is a small rural county, or to Lawrence County, or to any other county, they would not be interested primarily because they have no way of servicing the loan in such counties.

Mr. AIKEN. That is correct.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I wish to say, to their credit, that many of the companies joined together and established the VHMCP, a voluntary program for making loans; and they have tried to penetrate these areas insofar as possible. However, they have only a limited amount of funds, even when they have combined their resources. Their testimony is that, despite all they are able to do, the direct-loan program is still needed in order to reach certain areas which they simply cannot reach.

Mr. AIKEN. Furthermore, the record shows that more persons can be decently housed by the expenditure of the same amount of money in rural areas than in urban areas.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly that is true.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. Someone has said that we are discriminating against the veterans——

Mr. SPARKMAN. I did not say that.

Mr. CAPEHART. I realize that; some others have said it. However, the fact is that we are not discriminating against the veterans. In fact, we are discriminating against the other groups in the population by giving the veterans an advantage.

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; as I view the situation, we are simply trying to equalize the opportunities.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield to the senior Senator from North Dakota, who, I may say, was most helpful in the writing of similar legislation for direct loans to farmers for decent housing.

Mr. LANGER. Let me ask the distinguished Senator from Alabama what percentage of such loans the veterans who live in the rural areas have been receiving during the last 9 years.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am sure the Senator knows that all of the money in this program goes to veterans living in rural areas or in small towns. If the Senator is inquiring about what direct loan funds go to veterans living on farms, I do not know. About the size of this program related to the overall housing program, it would be hard to compare, because this is a direct-loan program, whereas the other programs are insurance or guarantee programs. The FHA insurance program is approximately $30-odd billion, and the VA guarantee program involves some $24 billion of loan guarantee for direct Government loans to veterans in rural areas or small towns. The figure is $1 billion. It is only one-thirtieth of the FHA program and about one twenty-fourth of the VA guarantee program. So it would be only a small percentage of the whole.

Mr. LANGER. Yes. The Senator from Alabama knows that if it had not been for the direct loans by the Government last year the farmers would not have been able to obtain such loans.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; and that is why last year I proposed legislation to take care of the situation, which the Senator from North Dakota joined in sponsoring; and he was quite instrumental in getting it through.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. The point is that all of us are in sympathy with the veterans and also with the farmers; and we wish to do the right thing. But we wish to start on this proposed legislation—I am sure the Senator from Alabama has the same thought—being the first piece of major legislation of this session, by seeing whether we can remove enough authorizations or appropriations, without either hurting our people or hindering the program, to make it possible to balance the budget. That is what we are trying to do. We are not attempting to hurt or to hinder anyone; our purpose is simply to help the 170 million Americans by keeping down the expenditures and the budget, so it will not be necessary to raise taxes.

So we are not attempting to hinder the program. Instead, our endeavor is to find whether we can delay some items for a period of time, without hurting anyone or any group, and at the same time get a balanced budget, and perhaps a little surplus. That is what I am interested in. I am not interested in hindering any program, and I know the able Senator from Alabama feels the same way about the matter.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana knows how I worked in the committee to try to hold this program to what I consider to be reasonable limits; and—as I have stated earlier—after all, this bill represents essentially what was agreed to here last year between the distinguished Senator from Indiana and myself and other Members who participated in that compromise settlement.

Mr. CAPEHART. I believe that is a correct statement.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. CAPEHART. However, I think circumstances today are different, because today there is a greater demand on the Government for missiles and rockets and to meet the military threat of our enemy. So I believe we must take that factor into consideration, and must see whether we can, in the case of every bill which comes before us this year, cut off some of what I shall call, for lack of a better description, the fat, or find some way by which we can eliminate a little of the proposed expenditures without hurting the programs.

Here is one instance of that sort, I believe; and we are endeavoring to have a balanced budget and, possibly, reduced expenditures, because I believe the country will be better off if we operate on that basis.

Mr. SPARKMAN. As I stated earlier, I favor a balanced budget; but I want it in connection with a balanced economy.

Mr. CAPEHART. That is correct; and I agree.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not believe we should sacrifice the one for the other.

Mr. CAPEHART. I am 100 percent in agreement that we should not. But I believe we can have a balanced economy and also a balanced budget.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Furthermore, as the Senator from Indiana may recall, earlier I pointed out that all of these loans are profit making; and I deplored the bookkeeping system the Government has, which does not permit these expenditures to be shown as capital expenditures, rather than just as dead-end expenditures, inasmuch as the Senator from Indiana knows they are not dead-end expenditures at all.

Mr. CAPEHART. I agree. As I said to the press, I know of no piece of proposed legislation about which there has been so much misunderstanding and so many unfactual statements as there have been about the housing bill which now is before us.

On the facts, which speak for themselves, we are not too far apart; and I believe that before we get through—and I know the able Senator from Alabama will be very, very helpful—all Members of the Senate will demonstrate their good, common sense, and thus will make it possible to eliminate from this housing bill the items which are not essential, but which can be eliminated without hindering the bill at all. After they are eliminated, I believe we shall have one piece of legislation which will add very little—although, of course, it will add a little—to the drain on the Treasury, which has a tendency to put the budget out of balance.

Mr. SPARKMAN. At this time, let me say—in reply to the question the Senator from North Dakota asked me a few minutes ago—that I now have before me some figures which bear on the question he asked. I refer now to page 609 of the hearings, from which I shall read a brief statement which was included in the testimony received from the Veterans' Administration:

> From the beginning of the direct home loan program in mid-1950 through December 1958, we have made 126,850 direct loans amounting to nearly $956 million—

I guessed that the correct figure was $1 billion; and, obviously, I did not miss by very much the exact amount—> to veterans in rural areas and in small cities and towns where private mortgage funds for guaranteed home loans have not been generally available.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, a while ago I said the FHA itself has incurred contingent obligations in excess, I believe, of $30 billion, and is requesting additional authority by means of this bill. The FHA has requested $12 billion. My bill proposes $8 billion. The committee struck a balance between the two at $10 billion. So, under the terms of this bill, the FHA will receive $10 billion of additional authorization; and we may very well assume that in another year or year and one-half the FHA may have engaged in contingent obligations amounting to more than $40 billion. But it is $1 billion direct loans to veterans as opposed to $30 billion for FHA and $24 billion VA-guarantee program. That does not take into account all the other different housing programs. So it is a very small percentage of the whole.

Now, Mr. President, I shall move on rapidly to some of the other matters contained in the bill. A great many persons are interested in the home improvement plan and the continuation of that program. It has been one of our most successful programs. Under the bill, the program would be continued for about 15 months. It is due to expire on June 30 of this year. Under the bill, it is continued until September 30, 1960, which will give us ample time next year to consider it, and perhaps to continue it for a longer period of time. My own feeling was that it might have been well to continue the program for 5 years. However, it is a program to which nobody objects. Those interested in the program may well be assured that it will be continued from time to time.

Something has been said here by Senators about the speed with which the bill was brought to the floor. I commented on it yesterday. I shall not say more except to call attention to the fact that, even though the bill is an omnibus bill, it contains about four matters which I consider to be urgent—and, as a matter of fact, three of which the administration considers to be urgent, because the administration submitted a request, in the very beginning of the Congress, asking Congress to authorize those three emergency matters.

The committee decided it would be better to place all of the subjects in one bill and get housing legislation behind us for the year. That is the reason why the committee brought the bill to the floor so quickly.

I spoke about the FHA authorization. FHA is going to be unable to insure loans after about the middle or the last part of this month. The agency will have run out of funds. Therefore, it is urgent that legislation covering its needs be enacted. That is one of the requests of the administration. The bill authorizes less than the request made.

Another item is college housing loans. The administration requested additional authority for that purpose. By the way, $200 million was requested immediately. The administration is going to submit a program later which will request more funds.

That is another point I wish to make. When some persons take hold of the bill and try to ascertain the difference between the amount authorized in the bill and in the administration bill, they overlook a very significant point—that the administration, in submitting its program, has left several items out, saying they would be submitted later. The amount desired by the administration for college loans will be submitted later. It does not appear in its proposal. It makes the bill, as reported by the committee, look as though we are asking for $200 million more than the administration is requesting when, as a matter of fact, the committee may not be asking for as much as the administration is.

The same is true with respect to loans for nursing homes. There are a good many hundreds of thousands of persons in this country who live in nursing homes. They are elderly people, or people of all ages who, because of some disability, require nursing care and a degree of medical care, but not sufficient medical care to require their stay in hospitals, so they live in nursing homes.

I think the conscience of the country has been shocked in recent months by some of the terrible fires which have broken out in nursing homes and the loss of life which has resulted.

The American Hospital Association, the American Medical Association, and the American Nursing Association have asked the committee to include provision for nursing homes in the bill. At first the committee was reluctant to do so. I felt it was a matter which was within the jurisdiction of the committee over which my senior colleague from Alabama [Mr. HILL] is chairman, the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. But I took the matter up with him and his committee, and they agreed that the matter should be taken care of in our bill. In fact, they asked us to adopt some of the language which was proposed in that committee.

So it is difficult to compare the two bills, because the committee bill is complete and in several instances the proposals submitted by the administration are not complete.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. If in Birmingham, Ala., it was desired to have a nursing home, what would be the procedure, under the bill, for getting one?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let me say, generally and briefly, it would have to be shown, through the proper agency in the State of Alabama, which would be the State health department, that there was need for the nursing home. Second, it would have to be shown that there was a regular State licensing system which assured proper sanitation, proper care, and such matters. In other words, it would have to be a genuinely approved nursing school, under the best standards.

Mr. LANGER. Would any matching of funds be involved?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; only borrowing is involved; no grants are provided. The bill permits FHA to insure up to 75 percent of the value of the property. The borrowing, of course, is from private funds. The FHA would insure the loan. By the way, the maximum rate of interest which would be permitted under this program would be 5 percent with authority for the FHA Commissioner to increase the rate to 6 percent.

It is not what one could call a liberal program at all. It is a new program, and I think a very good one. We have provided for the safety standards which have been suggested to the committee by the American Medical Association, the American Hospital Association, and the American Nursing Association. We incorporated into the bill even some of the language proposed by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Mr. LANGER. It seems to me the provision is not liberal at all.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is not liberal, but it is what was requested.

Mr. LANGER. In other words, the nursing home would have to find someone willing to lend it $250,000 or $300,000, and the FHA would guarantee 75 percent of the loan?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I believe the testimony was that the average cost of a nursing home is $25,000. So there would have to be raised the amount of $60,000 or $65,000. Then someone would take a mortgage for the remainder, and the FHA would insure the loan. It is a program which will enable people in nursing homes to get out of fire traps and get decent, serviceable, efficient facilities.

Mr. LANGER. Why, may I ask, will the Government insure only 75 percent of the loan?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It was all the association asked for or wanted.

I stated the Government was asking for three emergency matters: The increase in the FHA insurance authorization, college housing loans, and capital grant funds for urban renewal. We decided the thing to do was to put all of this in one bill, especially since the Senate passed on the matter last summer. We wanted to get it over with and get the housing problem behind us. I think there is ample logic for the position we took.

We tried to increase the incentives for rental housing, for cooperative housing, and for urban renewal housing.

We tried to increase the incentive for rental housing primarily for the reason that there is a dearth of rental housing being built throughout the country now. A great many communities need rental housing. In my own home town of Huntsville, Ala., there has been a great influx of population and a tremendous increase in the demand for housing due to the location of the Redstone Arsenal. There is practically no rental housing available. The community got along pretty well with the sales housing, but it is all that can be done to keep up with the sales housing. A great many people come to the community who will be there only 3 months, 6 months, or a year or so, and they do not want to buy houses. The community simply cannot get enough rental housing built. We have tried to increase the incentive for rental housing.

Mr. President, we tried to step up incentives for rental housing, cooperative housing, and urban renewal housing.

Cooperative housing comes as near as any housing to meeting the needs of the middle income group.

As to the urban renewal housing, we are attempting to get some kind of low-cost housing, housing the people can afford to buy or rent. This is the FHA section 221 housing, which people of relatively low incomes can afford. We have tried to increase the incentives for that type of housing.

We have set up a new program of housing for the elderly. This is a field which has been almost neglected, certainly until recent years. About 3 or 4 years ago the staff of the subcommittee made the first study, so far as I know, as to the needs of housing for elderly persons. I refer Senators to that study for probably the best compilation of information which we yet have had available.

In this program we have tried to set up a program which will make it possible to build housing for elderly persons. The administration proposed a similar program, but there is a difference between our approach and the administration approach. I desired to mention that, because many of these provisions are about the same.

The administration wanted the housing for elderly persons more or less in colonies. Our committee decided that was not the way to handle the subject, that we should not colonize the elderly people. We thought we should permit the elderly people to live in housing projects where their own children lived and where there were neighbors living. We thought the housing should be suitable for their use. To provide for those benefits, we required that at least 50 percent of the housing in the project should be built so as to be suitable for use by elderly persons.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. Will the distinguished Senator explain exactly how this would be done, with respect to an elderly couple? Exactly what would be the procedure?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The biggest single incentive in the matter is that we permit the FHA to insure at 100 percent. In other words, there would be no down-payment required so far as the cost of the house was concerned. We tried to write into the law the cost elements, and tried to require that the housing be planned for elderly persons, with no high steps and everything on one floor. The different parts of the house must be built so as to make the house particularly adaptable to elderly persons.

This is more or less of an experiment, but I believe it is a start, and that we can develop even a better program as we go along.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator from Vermont is seeking a little more information. Among the proposed amendments there is one which disturbs me considerably, which relates to college housing. Has the Senator from Alabama discussed that subject?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No, I have not discussed college housing. We have a college housing program. I wonder what item the Senator has in mind?

Mr. AIKEN. As I understand, there is an amendment to be proposed which would greatly reduce the amount of money available for loans for college housing, for educational purposes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Of course, I certainly would be against that proposal. I think the majority of the committee would certainly be against it. We discussed the matter thoroughly in the committee, and the figure as shown in the bill is what the majority of the committee decided upon.

Mr. AIKEN. Does the Senator from Alabama believe the amount which is included in the bill will be actually necessary and will be taken up by the colleges?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. Just a few minutes ago I invited attention to some of the hidden differences, if I may so call them, between our bill and the administration bill. Everyone who has analyzed the bills has tried to make it appear that our bill includes a great deal more than the administration bill. I used college housing as an illustration. We propose to increase the amount to be loaned to colleges for college housing purposes by $400 million. The administration proposed in its emergency bill to increase the sum by $200 million, and said it would come up later with a request for an additional amount. I am not sure there is much difference between our bill and the administration request, including the amount the administration has not submitted. This is a long-range proposal.

Mr. AIKEN. In the general legislation for the promotion of higher education which was enacted into law by the Congress last year, how much was provided for construction?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Nothing. I believe no construction was provided for.

Mr. AIKEN. I think the Senator is correct. I am simply seeking information.

Mr. SPARKMAN. There was no construction. That was a bill for fellowships, aid in procuring laboratory equipment, graduate studies, and things like that.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator is correct. I think the legislation which was passed last year was designed to make it possible for more of our high-school graduates to go to college.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. AIKEN. I am wondering how ridiculous we would be if we made it possible for thousands more to go to institutions of higher education, without providing any place for them to go.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator states the situation very well. This is definitely a program related to our present college housing program, which has proved to be so very successful.

Mr. AIKEN. Am I correct in my understanding that, of all the loans made to colleges to date, not a single dollar has been in default?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not have the figures, but the other day I heard the statement made—I believe it was made in testimony before our committee—that no college loan was in default. I obtained the impression that that statement included all loans—private and otherwise. But certainly no loans made under our college housing program have resulted in the loss of a single dollar.

Mr. AIKEN. More than 800 loans have been made.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. AIKEN. Without the loss of a single dollar to date.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. AIKEN. And probably there will not be a single dollar lost up to the time when the loans are completely matured and repaid.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

I know the unending interest the Senator from Vermont has in little people. His State is made up of little people, as is my State. In both States there is a predominance of little schools, little farmers, little colleges, and so forth. This program has been a lifesaver for a great many of our smaller colleges throughout the country. Many of the large colleges which have rich endowments can get all the money they want.

Mr. AIKEN. In Vermont we do not have wealthy colleges, with endowments of $100 million or more.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The same is true in my State. In fact, it is true throughout most of the country.

Mr. AIKEN. We have quite a few small colleges which, since 1951, have been borrowing modest amounts under the Federal loan program.

Mr. SPARKMAN. And they have put their students in decent dormitories, instead of the slum or shack type of structures left over from the war.

Mr. AIKEN. They have disposed of many of the hangar types of dormitories left over from the war, and have provided decent places to live, decent classrooms, decent cafeterias, and so forth. Yet they are still unable to meet the demand that they accommodate more students.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is true.

Mr. AIKEN. I know that they are looking forward to the extension of this loan program, so that they may continue to expand until they are able more nearly to meet the demands which are being made upon them.

I realize that if the people of the country had their way most of their children would come to Vermont to get their higher education. We do not expect that, but we do expect all those within our State, and many from neighboring States, to come there. We want to make it possible for them to do so.

Those institutions have made loans since 1951 which have varied from $340,000 up to $800,000. They are paying those loans back, and they are educating young people, not only from Vermont, but from neighboring States as well. They wish to continue to do so.

If this legislation should go through as some would have it go through, I am wondering what would happen to my State if no loans were available for rural areas, and the college loan fund were done away with. We would not be in a very favorable position.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Vermont.

Mr. President, there are several other items which I might mention. I shall mention only a few more. I hope to be quite brief.

One of the items is really the biggest item in the bill, namely, the urban renewal program. Urban renewal is one of the emergency measures for which the administration wished to provide in a quick measure.

The administration is in favor of continuing the slum clearance and urban renewal programs. Slum clearance was started in 1937. There was a provision in the United States Housing Act of 1937 for slum clearance, but the program really was not brought to life until the Housing Act of 1949, when it was written into the law in consequence of the efforts of the predecessor of our distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE]. Senator Taft, Senator Ellender, and Senator Wagner were the three cosponsors who worked for years to develop the Housing Act of 1949. It was a great accomplishment. I had the pleasure of serving as chairman of the subcommittee when the bill was put through on the floor of the Senate. It was a great achievement.

Title I of the Housing Act of 1949 was what we called the slum clearance and redevelopment title. We worked at it for 4 or 5 years, and obtained such experience as we could.

In 1954 the act was changed and expanded. The urban renewal program has now really taken hold. It is financed with loans and grants. Capital grants are made by the Federal Government to the locality to help defray the cost of the program. The Federal Government pays two-thirds, and the locality pays one-third of the amount which is lost in the process of buying the property, removing the buildings, and doing the work of clearing the area and reselling the property for redevelopment.

While the proportions are two-thirds and one-third, what is meant is the Federal Government pays two-thirds of the net cost and the locality pays one-third.

Testimony from a successor of our distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE], Mayor Celebrezze, of Cleveland, who testified before our committee the other day, gave the actual figures which were relevant to the Cleveland urban renewal projects. He showed that Cleveland had actually borne 51 percent of these costs rather than one-third. So whereas the law reads one-third and two-thirds, the testimony before us is that the amount of the costs which the city or the local authority pays is often 50 percent, because there are a great many fringe jobs to be done which the Federal Government does not include as a proper development cost.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. This morning there came to me a telegram from a person in Chicago, stating that a project there cost $11 million for the acquisition of the land, and that it was then sold to private developers for $1½ million. This writer expressed concern about the great disparity between the cost and the price at which the land was sold.

I ask the Senator from Alabama whether that item was brought to the attention of the committee. It is a new matter, which came to my desk only this morning. That is all the telegram says, so I know nothing further about the case.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That situation certainly will bear looking into. I should be terribly shocked to learn that such a statement was true. We certainly will be glad to check into it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If that were the fact, under the present law if there were a loss of $9½ million, 66 percent would be borne by the Federal Government and one-third by the local authorities, plus the fringe expenditures to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

I refer the Senator to a project in Chicago. This may be the one to which he was referring. There was an application from Chicago for $16,959,000 for one project.

Before I go further, I may say to the Senator that this will not be a satisfactory answer, and that we will have to check into it for the Senator.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I received a telegram relating to this matter.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we maintain a full-time staff in the Subcommittee on Housing, and that he would be surprised, I am sure, to know how many instances exactly like the one he cites we check into through the year. We are instructed in the resolution which the Senate adopted to stay on top of this problem all the time in order to know what is going on. We will be delighted to check into the matter and see what knowledge we can gain.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator understands that what I have communicated to him is the only knowledge I have, and that came to me in a telegram.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I invite the Senator's attention to page 82 of the report, and the table contained on that page. It shows approval actions from December 8 to December 31, 1958. Those are the submitted projects which are shown under Chicago. They total $16,959,994. Does the Senator see that figure under Chicago?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Under the formula limit Chicago was allowed $10,963,000. I believe that was in accordance with the rationing formula, because they ran out of money and had to ration the money. Of that amount, $8,797,655 has been approved. That is the only information we have as of this time, but we shall be glad to run down the information. Certainly the figures the Senator has given do not look right to me.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. In my case, as in the case of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, this is a field in which I do not have much specialized information, not being a member of the committee, and there not being any urban renewal projects in my State.

I recall that when an item like this came up 2 or 3 years ago, I referred it to the attorney general of Florida. I received from him a telegram, which I placed in the RECORD at that time, to the effect that the supreme court of our State had ruled that under the Florida constitution our cities were not authorized to use public funds in acquiring property in urban renewal projects which would not be used for city purposes but, instead, would be devoted to other uses.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator. That is my understanding. I do not have such information at the moment, except that I requested information from the General Counsel of the Urban Renewal Administration. I have from him a memorandum showing that as of August 1, 1958—which I suspect is the last date on which he has any information—Florida was one of eight States which did not have authority to enter into urban renewal proposals; that is, that the cities of our State and in these other States do not have that authority.

The list given to me by the General Counsel of the Urban Renewal Administration comprises these States: Florida, Idaho, Louisiana, Montana, New Mexico, South Carolina, Utah, and Wyoming. There is a notation on the list that South Carolina has started on a proposal by which at the next session of the legislature, as I understand it, if the legislature so decides, South Carolina can qualify its cities to go into this program.

I should like to ask my distinguished friend if that is also his understanding of the situation.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct. I believe the outlying possessions come under it also, except for Guam.

Mr. HOLLAND. The same list shows Guam as not being qualified. I understand that Alaska and Hawaii are qualified.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Puerto Rico also.

Mr. HOLLAND. I have no information on that point.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am not sure, but I believe that is true.

Mr. HOLLAND. If I understand the matter correctly, omitting the areas which are not States at the present time, there are at the present time eight States in which no urban renewal projects can be undertaken under State law; is that correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is my understanding.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not also the case that in some of the urban renewal projects there is very little, if any, housing involved from the standpoint of replacing houses for people to live in?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Well——

Mr. HOLLAND. To continue, if I may, I must say that I do not have specialized information on this subject, but I saw an interview on television the other day with Robert Moses of New York, who, as we all know, is a very distinguished citizen and public servant in New York, and who is serving the State and city in numerous developments and improvements, and in the interview reference was made to an urban renewal project in New York City which is termed the Washington Square project, in connection with which one of the great universities of that city is using up a large part of the area being renewed for the purpose of building various college buildings and for the purpose of constructing at least four different auditoriums or buildings of that type. Is the Senator familiar with that project?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Not with that particular project, but I can well understand that such a project would be undertaken.

Mr. HOLLAND. As I read the proposed law, in the case of colleges and universities, an exception is made, under which housing does not necessarily play a very substantial part. Is that correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. A relaxation of the requirement is carried in the bill. The general law now in existence provides that the area must be predominantly residential, and that has been held to be at least 51 percent.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the Senator mean that an area which is used for a renewal project must be at least 51 percent in residential use up to the time the project is initiated or in its conversion housing use after the project is completed?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Either way.

Mr. HOLLAND. It is a fact, is it not, that there are projects in which 51 percent of the area which was found to be residential before the project was initiated and before the land was taken is being used for various industries, colleges, auditoriums, civic projects, and things of that kind, which are not residential?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Provided that the rule is observed that 51 percent is residential.

Mr. HOLLAND. Except in the case of colleges. Is that correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; that is carried in the bill. It is a special provision in the bill. In addition, we have in the bill what is called the skid row amendment, which was adopted 3 or 4 years ago, to permit certain areas with a substantial number of slum dwellings in a city to qualify even though the 51 percent provision cannot be applied. I believe that 10 percent of capital grant funds can be used for such areas. Our bill would increase this percentage to 20 percent which may be used for that purpose.

Mr. HOLLAND. The purpose of my question is this. First I wish to show that in the case of colleges or universities the residential requirement need not be carried out, as is the case in connection with other areas. Is that correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct under the proposed bill.

Mr. HOLLAND. Either before or after.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. However, in the case of other urban renewal projects it is required that residential facilities be made available for those who are displaced, but not on the spot.

Mr. SPARKMAN. You are correct, decent housing must be made available for displaced families.

Mr. HOLLAND. But not on the spot. Is that correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct. There is a provision in the bill which seeks to encourage the building of more residences within the urban renewal area for housing the people who have been displaced. We carry such a provision in the bill.

Mr. HOLLAND. There are projects on which a serious problem is raised by where the people who have been dispossessed by the project are to live. Is that correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Federal assistance will not be authorized for a project until arrangements have been made for taking care of the displaced families.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to ask the Senator why there has been the discussion in the press of Washington, which he has seen, I am sure, and which I likewise have seen, in recent months, indicating that there is a grave question as to whether citizens dispossessed by the urban renewal project in the southern part of the city of Washington would have adequate housing?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am not familiar with those press reports. Certainly, I cannot conceive of such a situation, because under the law a project cannot be approved until a plan is made which will assure decent and sanitary shelter for the people who have been displaced.

By the way, if the Senator will let me do it at this point, I should like to call attention to the fact that we carry in the pending bill an authorization of 35,000 additional low-rent housing units. In the bill I introduced, I provided for only 17,500, but the committee raised the figure to 35,000. The whole purpose of public housing is to make available decent housing to those people who cannot afford to pay an economic rent. I believe I could describe it in this way: Let us take, for example, the usual slum area. Some people who live there own their own houses, and some of them are paying rent. Perhaps they pay only a few dollars a week or something like that. Those who own property will get enough out of the sale of their property to enable them to make a downpayment on another house, possibly under the FHA section 221 program. That is a special program with very liberal financing terms to enable those people to buy. Now let us look at those families who rent in this area. At present they are paying a couple of dollars a week rent, and cannot make any downpayment, nor can they afford to pay an economic rent. In most cities, there will be public housing projects, and a pledge will be given to the urban renewal administration that certain public housing units will be reserved to take care of those who are not able to pay an economic rent. The law provides that those families have a priority as far as available public housing units is concerned.

Mr. HOLLAND. I notice in the tabulation submitted by the Senator from Indiana a few minutes ago, prepared by the Housing and Home Finance Agency, that one of the complaints of the administration is that $13 million is proposed to be supplied by the Senate committee for an annual contribution to public housing construction. Is my understanding correct that that item is not included in the administration bill?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct. They were proposing a different program altogether. By the way, if the Senator will permit me to say so, in connection with the discussion we had a minute ago, it might be well to read into the RECORD this brief statement of the law, from section 105 of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended:

Contracts for loans or capital grants aid shall be made only with a duly authorized local public agency and shall require that—

* * * * *

(c) There be a feasible method for the temporary relocation of families displaced from the urban renewal area, and that there are being provided, in the urban renewal area or in other areas not generally less desirable in regard to public utilities and public and commercial facilities and at rents or prices within the financial means of the families displaced from the urban renewal area, decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings equal in number to the number of and available to such displaced families and reasonably accessible to their places of employment.

I remember the writing of that section. It was a very difficult section to write, but I believe we packed into it just about every requirement.

Mr. HOLLAND. Will the Senator from Alabama state just what is accomplished by the difference in the wording of the proposal embraced in the pending legislation, where colleges and universities are brought into the picture?

Mr. SPARKMAN. If I can find it quickly, I will read the specific part of the report. First, the urban college must be a part of a renewal area, or contiguous or adjacent to it. The bill provides that such an area would qualify as an urban renewal area even though the area is not predominantly residential.

The bill would also permit the community to be given credit toward its one-third share from expenditures made by the colleges in purchasing property within the urban renewal area. This credit would still be permitted even though the college made the expenditure up to 5 years prior to the start of the urban renewal project.

Mr. HOLLAND. In other words, as to colleges and universities which, under the present program, are permitted to take part in a fuller way, the investments they have made in acquiring property within the urban renewal area within the last 5 years may be considered as a part of the local contribution to the grant.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; just as would be true of the local authority, had it done the same thing.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it correct that the full authorization in the present urban renewal law is $1,350,000,000?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; the Senator is correct. The total amount authorized to date is $1,350,000,000.

Mr. HOLLAND. It is proposed by the bill to add $2.1 billion to that amount; is it not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Over the next 6 years.

Mr. HOLLAND. In other words, it is proposed by the bill to grant out of Federal funds for the urban renewal program an additional $2.1 billion for urban renewal projects throughout the Nation.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Over the next 6 years.

Mr. HOLLAND. That amount would be added to the $1.35 billion already authorized?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr HOLLAND But little of which has been spent up to now, although most of it has been allocated.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Practically all of it has been allocated, but only $156 million has actually been spent. By the way, the budget for 1960 calls for an expenditure of $104 million. Nothing in any of these bills will disturb that. It takes anywhere from 3 to 4 years to get one of these projects planned and under way. That is the reason there is such a long lead time. But a start cannot even be made on such a project until funds have been allocated.

Mr. HOLLAND. I think I understand clearly the point the Senator is making. The $2.1 billion additional will not be spent tomorrow. It does not even have to be spent in the next 6 years, but it will be allocated some time within the period provided in the bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. It will be grants of Federal funds to cities and States which are qualified to accept the benefit and which work out plans satisfactory to the Federal Government.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. Then it is proposed by the bill not only to make the whole program more generous, at least as it applies to colleges and universities in urban areas, but to add $2.1 billion in grants or largess out of Federal funds to certain cities which may have qualified in the course of the operation of the law.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator is correct. It is a slum clearance program which Congress saw fit to enact away back in 1937, to renew in 1949, and to revise in 1954.

About 3 years ago, President Eisenhower made a speech—I believe it was the President's speech—in which he dealt with this cancer that is eating America. In his speech he said that at the present rate it will take more than 200 years to get rid of the slums.

I point out to the Senator that the amount of grant allowances that are proposed in the bill, to which the committee agreed, is exactly what we had over the last 2 or 3 years—$350 million a year. As a matter of fact, most of the criticism which has come to me has been that we do not provide enough, because due to our not passing a bill last year a backlog has developed.

I estimate that during the first year about $500 million will be required. Therefore, the committee has provided in the bill that in the next year the amount may be stepped up by $150 million. That means that during the next year, if the President sees fit to do so, the amount may be stepped up to $500 million.

My own feeling is that with a 6-year program, giving ample time for planning, $350 million will be sufficient, with the $150 million escalator, and that the $2,100 million limitation will enable us to do a creditable job of cleaning up the slums of the country.

Again, there is not as much difference between our bill and the administration bill as many persons seem to think. Our bill provides for $2,100 million over 6 years, and with the same matching formula as now exists.

The administration's proposal is for $1,550 million over the next 6 years, with a gradual reduction of the Federal Government's contribution and a gradual increase in the local community's contribution.

So by 1962 the State or local governments participating would be required to match the Federal Government's contributions dollar for dollar.

The Senator from Florida heard me say to the Senator from Ohio [Mr.

LAUSCHE], formerly the mayor of the great city of Cleveland, that his successor in office as mayor of Cleveland testified that, actually, many American cities today are paying approximately 50 percent; and he showed us that Cleveland was actually paying 51½ percent.

Mr. HOLLAND. Am I correct in my understanding that the completed cost, insofar as the net cost of these projects is concerned, is proposed to be met by putting up two-thirds thereof from Federal grants?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. And one-third by local contributions?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. Which could be in cash or even in property acquired over the last 5 years?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. I think my friend has been very frank, and I appreciate it.

As I have understood his statement, it has indicated that it is proposed by means of this bill to increase the total authorization for the urban renewal program from $1,350 million to $3,450 million, or to increase it by $2,100 million, an increase of approximately 2½ times; and that it would commit the Nation, therefore, if that were enacted, to an increase of the old program by 2½ times what it was originally designed to be, and would commit us to heavy expenditures over the next several years.

Mr. SPARKMAN. This may be technical, but I wish to be sure that the record is absolutely clear on this point. The Senator from Florida said it would be 2½ times what it was originally designed to be. If he means "designed for all time," of course I differ with him, because when the act was written, it was designed that the Federal Government would continue on this formula until we got rid of slums in the country, insofar as the localities were willing and able to participate. In other words, the $1,350 million was only the amount which was made available for the first 4 or 5 years.

Mr. HOLLAND. But this would be a continuation of the program, by multiplying it by 2½, and thus increasing the funds available for urban renewal loans and grants over the next few years?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. Next, I should like to ask about a matter of policy. I cannot find any other paragraph of the bill which does not apply equally to all parts of the Nation and which does not allow some kind of construction work to go on in all parts of the Nation in most instances, direct residential construction, with most of which I am in complete accord. Why was it thought advisable by the committee—which knew that 8 States were not qualified to participate and that some of them have declined repeatedly, by their legislatures, to submit constitutional amendments which will allow them to participate—to attach this bill, not a national residential bill, and sometimes not even a residential bill at all, to a housing measure?

Mr. SPARKMAN. As I said at the beginning, this was done way back in the Housing Act of 1937; it is nothing new with us. It was carried forward in the Housing Act of 1949. It was carried forward in revised form in the Housing Act of 1954. We simply have been accepting the basic act, and have been providing for a carrying forward of the program, by making more funds available.

With reference to the point about its not applying to all parts of the Nation, if I am not mistaken that is also true with refcrence to the rural electrification program. I believe there are some States of the Union which do not permit that program to apply to them. Yet the Congress legislates in a national way on that program.

Mr. HOLLAND. In the case of the Rural Electrification Administration, do we make grants to anyone or do we lend money?

Mr. SPARKMAN. We lend money at 2 percent interest.

Mr. HOLLAND. And the money loaned is to be repaid, is it not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. But there are programs which do not apply equally, because there are certain requirements which have to be met by the States. That was true with regard to the old age insurance program, under the Old Age Security Act; and it was also true of unemployment compensation. I am sure all States participated; but there is nothing unusual about enacting legislation which provides that in order for a local government to participate, it must comply with certain standards or requirements. I do not know; but I presume that when this act was written into law, nearly 22 years ago, it was presumed that all the States would take advantage of it.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to ask another question, if I may. Both the Senator from Alabama and I heard the remarks made the other day by the Senator from Virginia [Mr ROBERTSON], who soon is to be chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee. In that statement he said that enactment of this bill would mean that the drain on the Treasury in the fiscal year 1960 would be increased by nearly one-quarter of a billion dollars. I do not remember the exact amount stated; but it was $240-odd million, or thereabouts.

Mr. SPARKMAN. In the figures which have been submitted to us by the Housing and Home Finance Agency—and the Senator from Indiana has them in his hand—we find that that figure is $240 million, I believe.

Mr. HOLLAND. I was trying to point out that the Senator from Virginia made substantially the same statement, as I recall. Is that the recollection of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; I believe that is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. Then, if the Senate passes the bill, it must do so in the knowledge that thereby it will be proposing, with the objectives of this bill, to increase the budgeted amounts by practically one quarter of a billion dollars, for the fiscal year 1960. That is correct; is it not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Florida to a point which was discussed earlier in the day, when he was not able to be on the floor. If he will look at the table, he will find that $200 million of that amount is attributed to the direct loan program of the veterans' housing in rural and semi-rural areas. Frankly, why that is carried as a budget item, I do not understand.

Mr. CAPEHART. It is borrowed directly from the Treasury.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is borrowed directly from the Treasury, but is money loaned to veterans which will be returned to the Treasury as the loans are repaid. But in our bookkeeping it is carried as a budget item.

As I pointed out earlier today, that is the greatest difference between our bill and the administration's bill. The administration's bill would do away with the direct loans, or at least would not provide any more money for the revolving fund.

Mr. HOLLAND. Then, as I understand, there is no argument about the fact that this bill would involve an expenditure, out of public funds, in the fiscal year 1960, of approximately one-quarter of a billion dollars more than the amount required by the administration's program. Is that correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct, provided the full $200 million that the Administration estimates would be spent for direct loans to veterans were actually used.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Florida to the point that on the one hand we are met with the argument that we do not need to increase or replenish the fund, which is a revolving fund; the money is loaned, and is paid back. By the way, in answer to an inquiry by one of the Senators I read into the RECORD the figures in that connection, and pointed out that six percent of the loans have been repaid; six percent have been sold; and ½ of 1 percent have been in default, to the point of foreclosure. It has been a most successful program. I call it a capital investment.

I called attention earlier today to something which I think is deplorable; that is our Government system of bookkeeping. It does not take into account such capital investments. I think the Senator from Florida will be interested in my repeating this. We put a billion dollars into the Federal National Mortgage Association under the Emergency Housing Act of 1958. All of that money went into loans that pay interest. I also indicated that the FNMA, during the time it has been operating, has made nearly a quarter of a billion dollars in clear profit. Yet that $1 billion was carried last year as if it were a dead expenditure—a deadend expense—when it is not.

This $200 million VA direct loan item is carried as if it is money to be spent—never to come back—when, as a matter of fact, such part of it as is spent will be recovered in profit-making repayments to the Government.

I started to say a minute or so ago that I am met by the argument, on the one hand, that now that we are raising the interest rate to 5¼ percent we do not need additional funds for the Veterans Direct Loan program. I cannot agree with that statement. As a matter of fact, mortgage investors, themselves, said that, regardless of all they could do, there were some areas in the rural sections of the country they could never reach with mortgage financing. So I think there always will be a need for direct home loans to veterans. But if that argument should be correct, and none of the $200 million should be spent, it would not have any impact on the budget. In other words, the expenditure is conditioned upon its being spent in the form of mortgages on homes of American families, veterans of the Second World War or the Korean war.

Mr. HOLLAND. I may say the Senator from Alabama has more faith in the type of operations that bureaucrats here in Washington carry on than I do, if he thinks they would not lend the money if Congress made available $200 million this year.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. HOLLAND. Under his statement, it might easily be more competitive with private enterprise than it would have been the other way.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I certainly do not want that statement to go unchecked, because the law itself requires that loans can be made only to worthy veterans living in rural or semirural areas who are not able to get money from private sources. That is the law.

If the Senator will read the testimony of some of the leading bankers and insurance company executives, he will see they testified before the committee it has been a good program, well administered, and ought to be continued.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

The Senator from Virginia stated in his remarks that certain items in the bill consisted of authorizations upon which expenditures would be made which would not come under the budget; that is, the agency could draw directly on the Treasury and then lend the amounts. I doubt if anyone could supply the amount required, unless a table on it has been prepared for the RECORD. If the Senator has it, I ask him to present it. Otherwise, I ask him to supply it for the RECORD, at his convenience, during the debate.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let me say, first, that there is no new provision in the bill for that type of funds. For example, let us take urban renewal, college housing, and that type of financing. The funds have been used over the years just as the Commodity Credit Corporation has used funds.

The Senator from Indiana has a table which shows the amounts for all activities of the Government. The Senator from Virginia was asked this morning about the total amount securing bank deposits. He reported a tremendously large figure. I do not remember what it was. We know FDIC carries $3 billion.

Mr. HOLLAND. Let me complete my point. The joint committee headed by the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] requested from the Treasury recently a compilation of amounts of that kind. The two largest were the expenditures for Federal aid highways, including the Interstate System, which was something over $3 billion, to be expended during this current year, not now appearing in the budget at all, and the other item was something like $400 million, or probably $500 million, for Federal National Mortgage Association expenditures.

The point I am getting at is, not only is the budget to be increased a quarter of a billion dollars by the bill which the Senator from Alabama proposes, but also items are again carried forward in the bill which call for expenditures vastly beyond the budgeted amounts, but they will be expenditures in fiscal 1960 and will be added to the financial burdens of the taxpayers of the country during that period. Am I correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator is correct. I called attention earlier to the fact that there are two or three parts of this program which the Administration has not yet submitted. However, comparing the bill against the partial program which the Administration has set, omitting the veterans loans, there would be in 1960 an expenditure of $35,790,000 greater than the administration's proposal. I do not know how much the other programs of the Administration would reduce that difference.

Mr. HOLLAND. But the Senator from Alabama also knows this bill would increase programs which call for unbudgeted expenditures by the Federal National Mortgage Association.

Mr. SPARKMAN. By the Federal National Mortgage Association? No; we do not increase the authorization for that agency at all.

Mr. HOLLAND. Unbudgeted expenditures——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Not by the Federal National Mortgage Association.

By the way, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point, because we have been referring a great deal to the Federal National Mortgage Association, the table appearing on page 155 of the hearings, which shows the operations of the Federal National Mortgage Association over the years. The table shows the operations of the agency at least over several years. I was hoping the total operations were shown there, because Mr. Baughman, in his statement before the committee, as I recall, showed that the total operations of the agency had resulted in a profit of something over $236 million.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator from Florida is trying to finish a point.

Mr. BUSH. I wanted to supplement what the Senator from Florida is trying to bring out.

Mr. HOLLAND. I think the additional figure supplied to us as to what is planned to be expended in 1960, additional to the Federal aid, referred to the entire Agency, the Housing and Home Finance Agency, rather than the Federal National Mortgage Association.

The Senator has already stated, and it is, of course, a fact, that there are increases in some of the activities which call for the type of expenditures proposed by his bill. What I have requested is that the total of those increases beyond the current program be furnished for the RECORD.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I believe that is shown in the table which has been submitted to us by the Housing and Home Finance Agency, which the Senator from Indiana placed in the RECORD a moment or so ago.

Mr. HOLLAND. It does not show anything except the budgeted expenditures. I am referring to nonbudgeted expenditures. These items do not show in the budget. The report of the Treasury to us showed that the proposed expenditures in fiscal 1960 for Federal-aid highways, nonbudgeted, were about $3.2 billion.

For this Agency there is enough more to bring the total to nearly $3.7 billion.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I say again, the Senator from Indiana has a table in this regard.

Mr. CAPEHART. I do not believe there are any unbudgeted items in the housing bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes, there are.

Mr. CAPEHART. Perhaps I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. SPARKMAN. What the Senator refers to is a financing by the Treasury. The point I make is that there are programs financed in that way. The urban renewal program receives appropriations.

Mr. HOLLAND. There are some programs in that category.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Some of the other programs are outside the budget, but there is not a single new program of that type. The programs have been in existence over the years. The Senator from Virginia today presented a table to show what the amount is for all the Government. I believe the Senator from Indiana later put that information in the RECORD.

Mr. CAPEHART. I do not think so.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think it was a part of the figures the Senator received. Perhaps the Senator from Virginia put the information in the RECORD. At least, the Senator had the information.

Mr. HOLLAND. I do not care to pursue the matter further. I simply say the Senator knows, as we all know, that there are amounts of money intended to be spent next year by this Agency which are not included in the budget, and that those amounts are to be spent in fields which are increased as to size in the bill. I hope the Senator can procure at least an approximate figure, so that we can have the information in the RECORD.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

If the Senator refers to loans——

Mr. HOLLAND. I do not refer to loans; I refer to grants.

Mr. CAPEHART. Loans made directly from the Treasury but not budgeted?

Mr. HOLLAND. For instance, the Federal aid highway expenditures are not loans; those are payments in cash. Those payments are not shown by the budget.

The budget is not a $77 billion budget. It is $77 billion for the items shown by the budget, but the amount which the administration intends to spend in fiscal 1960 is about $81 billion, and we all know that is the case. There is no use in trying to kid ourselves or the public.

What I am seeking to obtain is a showing—and I think it will be easy for those familiar with the bill to produce—as to the increases in those items which are not budgeted and which will not be budgeted but expenditures for which will be paid by the making of drafts by this Agency upon the Treasury of the United States, without Congress having anything to do about the matter, except to approve the basic authorizing legislation.

Mr. CAPEHART. I can give that information easily, because I have it before me. The item for college classrooms contains $5 million, and the estimated VA direct loans are $200 million. That is a total of $205 million in Senate bill 57, the housing bill, as amended.

The $200 million and the $5 million, of course, are loans, and are not budgeted. That refers to money borrowed directly from the Treasury. Of course, the money will be repaid, but these are loans and are not budgeted. The figure is $205 million.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I think my request has been clearly made, and I am sure my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] will supply the figure. I think it would be an interesting figure for the Senate to have. I appreciate the indulgence of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. CAPEHART. Is the Senator under the impression the figure is more than the record I have shows it to be?

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes. The figure for last year was supplied to the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures by the Treasury, and is vastly more than the one the Senator mentioned.

Mr. CAPEHART. I am talking about fiscal year 1960.

Mr. HOLLAND. I am speaking about the same figure. We asked for the figure as to what it was expected would be expended for objectives not covered by the budget, and we were given, as I have said, in two items alone, enough to increase the budget by about $3.7 billion.

Mr. CAPEHART. I think the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Alabama and I are thinking about different things. As shown by the chart before me we are talking about the effect of the bill presently under consideration. We are considering the effect on the 1960 budget in respect to nonbudgeted items, and that is $205 million.

In years gone by, the Congress has authorized expenditures for housing purposes. We have authorized $1,450 million for urban renewal, of which amount about one-fourth has been spent. Some of that comes under the same category.

Confining the figure to the bill about which we are talking, I think the Senator will find the figure is $205 million.

Mr. HOLLAND. If that proves to be the case, of course we do not need to go further. We should show that is the case.

Mr. CAPEHART. It is a sizable amount.

Mr. President, there is an interesting point which should be made, in all fairness. I am sure we want to keep the record straight.

As to the urban renewal advances, comparing the so-called administration bill with the Senate bill which we are considering, for example, for the fiscal year 1960 the administration bill for urban renewal, so far as advances are concerned, would provide $3½ million, and the Senate committee bill would provide $7 million. In 1961 the administration bill would provide $12 million and the Senate committee bill would provide $16 million. In 1962 the administration bill would provide $11 million and the Senate committee bill would provide $14 million. In 1963 the administration bill would provide $10 million and the Senate committee bill would provide $13 million.

Under the urban renewal temporary loans, there would be nothing provided in 1960 either under the administration bill or under the Senate committee bill.

However, in 1961 the administration bill would provide $15 million and the Senate committee bill woud provide $20 million. In 1962 the administration bill would provide $15 million and the committee bill would provide $20 million. In 1963 the administration bill would provide $15 million and the Senate committee bill would provide $20 million.

If we consider the grants, under the same two items, in 1960 the administration bill would provide nothing and the Senate bill would provide $3¼ million. In 1961 the administration bill would provide nothing and the Senate bill would provide $8 million. In 1962 the administration bill would provide $2 million and the Senate bill would provide $12 million. In 1963 the administration bill would provide $5 million and the Senate bill would provide $15 million.

Under the urban planning assistance the proportion is about the same, and I shall not read those figures.

In order to keep the record straight, in all fairness it should be said that these moneys for grants and loans are quite small, and they are spread out over a period of years. What I am saying is that the money we are talking about, $2.1 million for urban renewal on grants and loans, is the amount I have just mentioned. That does not include the amount of money, of course, which would be advanced for the loans which would be insured by the Federal Government. In those instances, unless the loans were defaulted there would not be one nickel cost to the Federal Government.

I think in all fairness we should keep those facts in mind. I think we also should mention the fact that only for the fiscal year 1960 is there a big difference between the impact upon the Treasury of the administration bill and the impact upon the Treasury of the Senate bill. By the time we consider 1961, 1962, 1963, 1964, and 1965—a 6-year period—there is not very much difference. There is a difference, but it is not very great.

In any event, the impact each year is not much in dollars and cents. What we are trying to do at the moment, of course, is to balance the fiscal year 1960 budget, and we are talking about a bill which affects the fiscal year 1960 budget. If we could eliminate the $300 million for direct loans to veterans and cut the public housing units from 35,000 to perhaps 17,500, the difference in the impact upon the Treasury between the administration proposal and the Senate bill we are considering would be about $35 million.

Mr. HOLLAND. I trust that the Senator from Indiana is not suggesting that he has any objection to the furnishing of one single figure, with an explanation, as to how greatly the spending picture is affected by items in the bill which we are considering. I refer to the spending for 1960, in fields not covered by the budget. I know that there are some items in that category, and I think it would be interesting to the Senate to have that information.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator may well be correct. Let us get the figures.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We will certainly do our best to obtain the figure which the Senator wishes, if it involves breaking down the information by budget years.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to put a question to the Senator from Indiana for the purpose of getting clearly in mind the aggregate draw which would be made upon the budgeted funds by this bill.

I should like to have the Senator from Indiana give me his opinion as to the increase which would be imposed upon the President's budget if the pending bill were passed.

Mr. CAPEHART. Does the Senator mean for the fiscal year 1960?

Mr. LAUSCHE. For the fiscal year 1960.

Mr. CAPEHART. According to the Federal Housing Authority officials, who have all the facts—although it is necessary for them to make certain estimates—it is estimated that if we pass Senate bill 57, authorizing $300 million for direct veterans loans, only $200 million of it will be spent, and that if we authorize 35,000 additional public housing units, picking up some authorizations which were not previously used, the total impact upon the Treasury will be approximately $240 million, as opposed to the administration's estimate of the impact of about $5 billion.

In all fairness, if we eliminate the $200 million for veterans loans, the difference between the impact of the administration's bill on the Treasury and that of Senate bill 57 will be about $40 million. If we reduce the public housing units to 17,500, the difference will be about $35 million; and if we eliminate any additional public housing at all, as I see it, the difference will be about $25 million.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It would greatly help me if the Senator from Indiana would eliminate the conditions and give the cold figures.

Mr. CAPEHART. I gave the cold figures. According to those who have the facts, and who ought to know—and if they do not know, I do not know who does, because they deal with the facts—the impact would be $240 million.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Has there been eliminated the sum of $100 million because it is assumed that the $100 million would not be used?

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes; and if the $100 million were used, the impact would be $340 million.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That amount would be added to the budget?

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes. The budget would be increased by that much, as compared with the administration bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, in response to the question of the Senator from Ohio, let me say that a part of the $5 million is budgeted already, so the net difference is $235 million, $205 million of which represents loans, including $200 million to the Veterans' Administration. This amount would be charged up only in the event it was used.

Mr. LAUSCHE. In the event it were drawn upon by applications for loans.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. It represents a contingency which remains. It is a credit which exists, which can be drawn upon. As the Senator from Indiana says, if we do not consider veterans' loans of $200 million, the difference is approximately $35 million.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one further question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to have the Senator from Indiana listen.

For the fiscal year 1960, what additional authorization is granted to various agencies to borrow money from the Treasury? Can that be stated in a single aggregate amount?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is the figure we are looking up in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND].

Mr. LAUSCHE. So there are two pertinent figures—first, the amount by which the budget would be increased; and second, the amount by which the national debt would probably be increased through borrowings from the Treasury.

Mr. HOLLAND. Unbudgeted expenses.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Unbudgeted expenses.

Mr. CAPEHART. I do not believe there are any.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If I correctly understand the table which has been furnished to us by the Housing and Home Finance Agency, in 1960 there will not be one dollar in that category.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, may I put a further question to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Did the committee take into consideration the wisdom of making sure that our Nation is adequately strong for defense; and in doing so did it conclude that perhaps more money will have to be spent for national defense? If so, a decision ought to be made as to which is the more important at this time—to provide money for national defense, or to expand this program over and above what the President has suggested.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Is the Senator proposing that we expand the defense program over and above what the President has suggested?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I am not certain, but I have been reading in the press that there is virtual unanimity of opinion that the program should be expanded. Therefore this query is raised in my mind: If that is necessary, the answer should be "Yes; make the Nation militarily strong." But, in order to insure against any unreasonable unbalancing of the budget, we ought to dispense with certain programs, even though they may be desirable, and go forward only with essential and needed programs.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not care to debate the philosophy of the issue. The committee, as a whole, discussed these questions. Questions came up from time to time, and I am certain, that every member of the committee had these matters in mind. I believe that every Member of the Senate feels the same way about the desirability of balancing the budget, and that most Senators would measure the necessity—if it becomes a necessity—of increasing the President's budget on military matters.

Insofar as I am concerned, I would like to balance the budget just as much as the President would like to balance it. He would like to see a balanced budget. However, if evidence ever comes before us that it is necessary to spend more money for defense, I will not hesitate to spend it even thought such spending may serve to unbalance the budget for 1 year.

So far as housing is concerned, I wish to take a little issue with the apparent philosophy of the Senator from Ohio. I do not regard housing as something that is merely desirable. I regard it as essential. I believe the Senator from Ohio does also.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is essential to provide decent, adequate and sanitary housing in which Americans can live. I regard housing just as essential as clothing, food and things like that. And to the list I add national defense. As a matter of fact I would put national defense over everything, because our security depends upon it. However, I do not believe that we should refer to housing as something that is merely desirable. I believe it to be essential.

I believe that every member of the committee had these matters in mind and under consideration. I believe that each member decided, after giving sincere and conscientious thought to these items, what his decision would be on the subject of housing. By the way, I should like to call attention to the fact that after we had completed the hearings but before we started marking up the bill, we called before us the staff of the Federal Reserve Board—in executive session—to give the committee a briefing on the economic condition of the country.

The Senator will remember that in the Committee on Foreign Relations we had a briefing from the military as to our defense posture. The Senator will remember that.

However, I believe that every Senator, acting within his own individual rights and in accordance with the dictates of his conscience had all those items I have enumerated in mind. The bill reflects the best collective thinking of the committee.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I wish to assure the Senator from Alabama that I deeply appreciate his courtesy and sincerity in approaching this problem. However, I am bothered by the fact that there are 8 or 10 other bills which are being considered by other committees. There is no coordination to ascertain what the overall cost will be after all the bills are passed, if they are passed. No one has taken pencil in hand and figured out how much money is available and what the ultimate aggregate cost will be. No one has tried to figure out what the deficit will be, or has tried to provide ways and means of meeting it. I am in favor of the housing program, but I believe we ought to conceive of some means of paying for it without indulging in deficit operations. That is the thought I had in mind.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. May I ask whether the Senator from Connecticut still wishes to ask a question? He wished to ask a question a short time ago.

Mr. BUSH. I thank the Senator, but I will defer the question for the present. The discussion is now far from the subject on which I wished to address an inquiry to the Senator from Alabama. I had reference to FNMA. I will get it in the RECORD some time later in the debate. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ELLENDER. I have been reading the report, as I had opportunity, and have been listening to the debate. I am much confused as to the difference in the impact the pending bill may have as compared with that of the administration bill. We have heard estimates made by the distinguished Senator from Alabama and others by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART]. In the report I note that the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT] has added some individual views.

In the third paragraph of his individual views, the Senator from Utah states:

> The increased burden on the budget for fiscal year 1960 resulting from adoption of S. 57 rather than the administration bill has been estimated at between $230 and $344 million. This would more than eat up the projected $70 million surplus for next year, and would start us on the road to a deficit which the President has so correctly renounced.

I should like to ask my friend from Alabama, in the light of these figures, given by a member of the committee, whether that statement is correct.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not know how the Senator from Utah has arrived at the $344 million figure. I believe that is a mistake.

Mr. CAPEHART. I believe I can answer that question. The figure I am giving is the figure supplied by the HHFA.

Mr. ELLENDER. Are those figures correct?

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes. The figures are based on the fact that we authorized $300 million for direct veterans' loans. They will be able to use only $200 million of that amount. The Senator from Utah in his statement said that the complete amount will be used up.

Mr. ELLENDER. The full amount that is being authorized on the program?

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes; whereas FHA is of the opinion that only $200 million of it would be used up. That accounts for the difference between the two figures.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator from Indiana and I are in agreement that the difference, actually, between the committee bill and the administration bill, so far as the 1960 budget is concerned, is $235 million.

Mr. ELLENDER. More?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; more. That includes the $200 million for loans to veterans living in rural areas.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yesterday I asked for some information. I do not know whether it has been presented to the Senate. I asked for information as to the full amount of the Federal Government's obligations with respect to FHA and veterans' guaranteed loans.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I believe the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] put that information in the RECORD earlier today.

Mr. ELLENDER. I was informed that by the end of the 1960–61 fiscal year the amount would total $102 billion. Is that correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not know. I have not seen the figure.

Mr. CAPEHART. Was that for 1962?

Mr. ELLENDER. No; 1961.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The present amount for FHA is approximately $30 billion, and for VA I believe it is $18 billion.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is a total of $48 billion.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That includes the insured loans.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; I would say that. Then there has been about a billion dollars loaned to veterans, and also a smaller amount—it may run to a billion dollars or $750 million—which has been loaned for farm housing.

Mr. ELLENDER. This amount is the amount which is actually guaranteed by the Federal Government?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Guaranteed or insured.

Mr. ELLENDER. I understand.

Mr. SPARKMAN. There is a difference, of course.

Mr. CAPEHART. There is a reserve of about $800 million.

Mr. SPARKMAN. On the insured portion premiums are collected, and there is a reserve, which is considered by many financial experts as being greater than is required.

Mr. ELLENDER. This bill increases by $8 billion the FHA guarantees?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The bill I introduced proposed $8 billion—$4 billion until June 30, 1959, and $4 billion thereafter. The administration asked for $12 billion for the same period. Later they asked that the ceiling be completely eliminated. The committee reported out a provision for $10 billion, that is $5 billion for fiscal 1956, and $5 billion thereafter.

Mr. ELLENDER. The total would be about what?

Mr. SPARKMAN. About $38½ billion.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is the overall amount?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. It is roughly $38 billion. It is between $38 billion and $40 billion for FHA.

Mr. ELLENDER. I wonder whether the Senator would repeat for the RECORD what he stated with reference to the programs which would increase the amount over and above the administration bill. Is it due primarily to the fact that we are providing for 35,000 more units of public housing in the bill?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is one of the items.

Mr. ELLENDER. To what extent would that increase the amount?

Mr. SPARKMAN. By $21 million.

Mr. ELLENDER. Twenty-one million dollars?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. CAPEHART. That is for fiscal 1960, is that correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It occurs only one time.

Mr. ELLENDER. That, of course, goes to make up the $200 million we were talking about a while ago.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. The rest of it comes——

Mr. SPARKMAN. From direct loans to veterans.

Mr. ELLENDER. And from college loans?

Mr. SPARKMAN. And from college loans; that is correct. There is $3.4 million for urban renewal advances.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator has stated that the $21 million for public housing for 1960 will not be continued.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is not a recurring item. The $200 million may be used or it may not. Of course, it is in the form of a loan.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a section-by-section analysis of the bill as it appears in the report beginning on page 63.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

TITLE I—FHA INSURANCE PROGRAMS

Property improvement loans

Section 101: Amends section 2(a) of the National Housing Act to extend the title I property improvement program of the FHA 1 year until September 30, 1960.

Technical

Section 102: Makes cross-reference between FHA section 204 (payment of insurance) and the six insurance programs to which the provision applies.

Mortgage ceilings for sales housing

Section 103: (a) Amends section 203(b)(2) of the National Housing Act (regular sales housing program) to increase the maximum mortgage amount which may be insured by FHA from $20,000 to $25,000 on two-family homes.

(b) Amends section 203(b)(8) of the National Housing Act (regular sales housing program) to increase the nonoccupant owner's maximum loan to the maximum permitted the homeowner, the nonoccupant owner would put into escrow 15 percent of the mortgage amount for 18 months or until he sells the property. (A nonoccupant owner is now permitted 85 percent of the mortgage amount available to a homeowner.)

(c) Amends section 203(i) of the National Housing Act (housing in rural and outlying areas) to permit an increase from $8,000 to $9,000 in the maximum insurable loan.

Mortgage insurance authorization ceilings

Section 104: Amends section 203(i) and section 701 of the National Housing Act to remove the ceilings on the FHA mortgage insurance authorizations.

FHA debentures

Section 105: Amends section 204(k) of the National Housing Act to permit the FHA to include in debentures the cost of acquisition and the cost of conveyance title to FHA.

Regular rental housing program

Section 106: Amends section 207 of the National Housing Act to delete all provisions relating to housing for elderly persons, since the proposed bill (in title II) establishes a new FHA section 231 program of mortgage insurance for elderly persons' housing.

The present dollar limitation on the maximum amount of a section 207 mortgage would be increased, as follows:

	Present		Proposed
	Per room	Per unit if under 4 rooms	Per room	Per unit if under 4 rooms
Garden type	$2,250	$8,100	$2,500	$9,000
Elevator type	2,700	8,400	3,000	9,400
Increase for high cost areas	1,000	----------	1,250	----------

Amends section 207(c)(3) to increase the mortgage limits for trailer courts or parks from $1,000 to $1,500 per space, and from $300,000 to $500,000 per mortgage.

Interest rate increases

Section 107: (a) Amends section 207 of the National Housing Act by establishing a new interest rate ceiling of 5 percent (present ceiling 4½ percent) with authority for the Commissioner to increase the rate to 5½ percent if he finds such action is necessary to meet the mortgage market.

(b) Amends section 213(d) of the National Housing Act to establish a new interest rate ceiling for section 213 management-type cooperatives as in (a) above. This section also amends section 213(d) of the National Housing Act by authorizing the Commissioner to increase the interest rate on section 213 sales-type cooperatives to 6 percent if he determines such action is necessary to meet the mortgage market. (This section would not change the basic ceiling of 5 percent on sec. 213 sales-type mortgages.)

(c) Amends section 803(b) of the National Housing Act to establish a new interest rate ceiling for section 803 military housing mortgages as in (a) above.

Cooperative housing

Section 108: (a) Amends section 213(b)(2) of the National Housing act to (1) increase the maximum loan ratio from 90 percent of replacement cost (95 percent of replacement cost if 50 percent of the cooperators are veterans) to 97 percent of replacement cost, and (2) increase the present dollar limitations on the maximum loan amount to the same amounts allowed for section 207.

(b) Amends section 213(d) to permit the inclusion of community and commercial facilities in mortgages on property held by sales-type and investor-sponsored cooperatives.

(c) Amends section 213 to extend the cooperative housing program to existing structures acquired by consumer cooperatives.

Mortgage ceilings for Alaska, Guam, and Hawaii

Section 109: Amends section 214 of the National Housing Act to provide that the 50 percent higher mortgage amount which the FHA Commissioner, at his discretion, may allow in Alaska, Guam, and Hawaii, may be applied to high-cost-area mortgage amounts in the programs where such high-cost-area provisions pertain. This section also permits the FHA Commissioner to assess a service charge in connection with mortgages assigned to him.

General mortgage insurance authorization

Section 110: Amends section 217 of the National Housing Act to increase FHA's general mortgage insurance authorization by $5 billion for each of the fiscal years 1959 and 1960. The portion of the fiscal year 1959 increase which is unused through June 30, 1959, may not be added to the revolving fund.

Repeal of obsolete provision

Section 111: Repeals section 218 of the National Housing Act, an obsolete provision, which permitted the transfer of application fees from the FHA section 608 program to the section 207, regular rental housing program.

Housing in urban renewal areas

Section 112: (a) Amends section 220(d)(3)(A) of the National Housing Act (urban renewal housing) to increase the maximum mortgage amount which may be insured by FHA on sales housing, as follows: From $20,000 to $22,500 on one-family homes; from $20,000 to $25,000 on two-family homes; and from $27,500 to $30,000 on three-family homes. The existing ceiling of $35,000 on four-family homes would not be changed.

(b) Amends section 220(d)(3)(B) of the National Housing Act (housing in urban renewal areas) to establish higher dollar limitations on the maximum amount of the mortgage on multifamily housing in urban renewal areas. The new ceilings would be the same as those proposed for FHA's section 207 (regular rental housing) program.

Amends section 220(d)(3)(B) to change the maximum permissible loan ratio from 90 percent of replacement cost (which may include a 10-percent allowance for builder's and sponsor's profit and risk) to 100 percent of replacement cost (excluding any allowance for builder's and sponsor's profit and risk).

Permits exterior land improvements (as defined by the FHA Commissioner) to be included in the mortgage without being computed as part of the per room or per unit cost limitations.

Permits the inclusion of such nondwelling facilities as the FHA Commissioner deems adequate to serve the needs of the occupants of the property and of other housing in the neighborhood.

(c) Amends section 220 to permit housing in urban renewal areas to be occupied by single persons.

Relocation housing

Section 113: Amends section 221 of the National Housing Act (relocation housing) to extend the benefits of the program to any family displaced within the environs of a community that has a workable program.

Section 114: (a) Amends section 121(d)(2) in order to (1) increase the maximum insurable loan for the construction or rehabilitation of sales housing from $9,000 to $10,000 in normal-cost areas, and from $10,000 to $12,000 in high-cost areas; and (2) make eligible for mortgage insurance two-, three-, and four-family dwellings which meet FHA minimum property standards and appropriate State and local housing ordinances or regulations.

(b) Increases the maximum insurable mortgage amount for multifamily projects from $9,000 to $10,000 per unit (from $10,000 to $12,000 in high-cost areas), and changes the valuation basis for computing the maximum insurable mortgage amount on relocation rental housing constructed by nonprofit mortgagors. At present private nonprofit corporations and public agencies are eligible for FHA-insured loans equal to 100 percent of the Commissioner's estimate of value. This subsection would place such mortgage insurance on a cost instead of a value basis for new construction.

This subsection would also make section 221 mortgage insurance available to other than nonprofit mortgagors for the production of rental housing for displaced families, on the same basis as section 220 redevelopment housing; i.e., the mortgage would be in an amount equal to the estimated replacement cost or actual certified cost (whichever is lower), exclusive of any allowance for builder's and sponsor's profit and risk.

(c) Amends section 212(a) of the National Housing Act to apply the prevailing wage requirements of the Davis-Bacon Act to multifamily (10 or more families) structures under FHA section 221 (relocation housing).

Section 115: Amends section 222(b) of the National Housing Act (mortgage insurance for servicemen) to (1) permit the benefits of section 222 in the purchase of property constructed under the provisions of section 203(i), and (2) increase the maximum insurable mortgage from $17,100 to $20,000.

Cost certification

Section 116: Amends section 227 of the National Housing Act to revise the cost-certification requirements affecting FHA section 220, section 221, and the proposed section 231 in accordance with amendments made by other sections of this bill.

Voluntary termination of insurance

Section 117: Amends title II of the National Housing Act by adding a new section 229 to authorize the FHA Commissioner to terminate any mortgage insurance contract upon request of the mortgagor and mortgagee.

Avoidance of foreclosure

Section 118: Amends title II of the National Housing Act by adding a new section 230 to authorize the FHA Commissioner to extend the time for curing a mortgage default covering a 1- to 4-family residence, and, in order to avoid foreclosure, to acquire the mortgage.

Legal notifications sent by mail

Section 119: Amends section 512 of the National Housing Act to provide that certain legal notifications be considered sufficient if sent to the last known address.

Transient housing in Alaska

Section 120: Amends section 513 of the National Housing Act in order to permit certain FHA section 207 and section 608 projects in Alaska to be used for transient use for a period not to exceed 3 years.

TITLE II—HOUSING FOR THE ELDERLY

Section 201: Adds a new section 231 to the National Housing Act to provide a new program of housing for elderly persons.

(1) The dollar limits on the maximum amount of the mortgage would be the same as those proposed for FHA's section 207 (regular rental housing) program. Interest rate ceilings would be the same as those proposed for FHA's section 207 program.

(2) Would permit insurance of mortgages up to 100 percent of replacement cost for nonprofit corporations, and 100 percent of replacement cost (excluding any allowance for builder's and sponsor's profit and risk) for other than nonprofit corporations.

(3) Would require that not less than 50 percent of the living units in the project be designed specially for use and occupancy by elderly persons. Elderly persons would be given a preference or priority of opportunity to rent all units.

(4) The economic soundness test of FHA's regular rental housing program (sec. 207) would not be applicable to the new program for elderly persons.

(5) The FHA Commissioner would be authorized to establish regulations and restrictions as to rents, charges, capital structure, rate of return, and methods of operation.

(6) Would apply the prevailing wage requirements of the Davis-Bacon Act, except that the wages which must be certified under the Davis-Bacon Act may be reduced by such amount as the FHA determines to have been fully credited to the mortgagor.

(7) Would include a provision making proprietary nursing homes eligible for FHA mortgage insurance, up to 75 percent of the value of the new or rehabilitated property. Mortgages insured under this new provision would bear an interest rate of 5 percent with authority for the Commissioner to increase the rate to 6 percent if he finds such action is necessary to meet the mortgage market. In addition, the Commissioner of the FHA would be required to obtain certain certificates from State agencies relative to the licensing and inspection of nursing homes prior to insuring mortgages.

TITLE III—URBAN RENEWAL

Statewide planning

Section 301: Amends section 101(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 by directing the HHFA Administrator to encourage the utilization of State agencies to provide effective solutions for urban renewal problems of smaller communities.

Technical

Section 302: Amends section 102(a) of the Housing Act of 1949 to clarify uncertainties in existing law whether the Federal Government's loan agreement with the local public agency covers interest as well as principal where local public agency pledging the loan agreement as collateral.

Early land acquisition and clearance

Section 303: Amends section 102(a) of the Housing Act of 1949 to authorize the HHFA Administrator to permit land acquisition and clearance prior to the signing of a loan and grant contract, provided local law permits such early acquisition and clearance, and provided that land acquired under this procedure shall not be disposed of until the urban renewal plan is approved by the local community.

Urban renewal loan authorization

Section 304: Amends section 102(e) of the Housing Act of 1949 to permit the Administrator to make borrowings from the Treasury in excess of $1 billion at discretion of the President.

Grant authorization

Section 305: Amends section 103(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 to provide a 6-year, $2.1 billion slum-clearance and urban-renewal program, with an annual capital grant authorization of $350 million, which could be increased by $150 million in any 1 year.

Repayment of uncollectible advances

Section 306: Amends section 103(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 to authorize the use of urban renewal grant funds to repay Treasury loans made to finance urban planning advances which are now uncollectible because of cancellation of the project.

Community renewal programs

Section 307: Amends section 103 of the Housing Act of 1949 by adding a new subsection (c) to authorize planning grants for the preparation of community renewal programs, which would enable a community to survey its urban renewal needs and resources, and schedule projects.

Technical

Section 308: Amends section 105(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 to facilitate public improvements involving the Federal Government and the District of Columbia in connection with urban renewal projects.

Section 309: Amends section 106(e) of the Housing Act of 1949 to eliminate the provision in existing law that not more than 12½ percent of the total loan authorization may be obligated in any one State; does not alter the 12½ percent State limitation on grant authorization.

Relocation payments

Section 310: (a) Amends section 106(f) of the Housing Act of 1949 to authorize relocation payments when the displacement is a result of any governmental activity in an urban renewal area, and of programs of voluntary repair and rehabilitation; increases from $100 to $200 the maximum amount of relocation payments to individuals and families; and increases from $2,500 to $3,000 the maximum amount of relocation payments to business establishments.

(b) Amends section 106 by adding a new subsection (g) to give business concerns which are displaced from urban renewal areas a priority of opportunity, insofar as practicable and desirable (as determined by the local governing body), to purchase or lease commercial or industrial facilities provided in connection with area redevelopment.

Priority for State-assisted projects

Section 311: Amends section 106 of the Housing Act of 1949 to establish a priority for projects toward which a State contributes at least one-half of the required local grant-in-aid.

Planning requirements

Section 312: Amends section 110(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 to authorize the HHFA Administrator to expedite urban renewal projects by permitting him to omit or to simplify present detailed requirements for the urban renewal plan.

Nonresidential development

Section 313: Amends section 110(c) of the Housing Act of 1949 to permit up to 20 percent (now 10 percent) of the total capital grant authorization to be used for areas which are not predominantly residential, and which are not to be redeveloped for predominantly residential uses, even if such areas do not include a substantial number of slum dwellings as presently required.

Noncash grants-in-aid

Section 314: (a) Amend section 110(d) of the Housing Act of 1949 to provide that improvements and facilities that are otherwise eligible may be credited as local grants-in-aid to urban renewal projects, provided their commencement does not precede the signing of the loan and grant contract for the project by more than 5 years.

(b) Amends section 110(d) to permit the cost of certain public improvements serving the urban renewal area to be credited as a local grant-in-aid when financed by revenue bonds payable from service charges against the users of the system.

Credit for interest payments

Section 315: Amends section 110(e) of the Housing Act of 1949 to authorize the HHFA to include interest on advances by a city (local public funds) as an item of gross project cost for an urban renewal project.

Uniform date

Section 316: Amends section 110(g) of the Housing Act of 1949 to make uniform the date for determining the application of the "going Federal rate" of interest under urban renewal contracts.

Technical

Section 317: Makes conforming amendments.

Federal recognition

Section 318: Waives the requirement in section 110(d) of the Housing Act of 1949 for communities whose projects could not obtain Federal recognition during the period from January 1, 1957, through December 31, 1958, because of limitations on the HHFA Administrator to make capital grants or to reserve funds. Under existing law, such Federal recognition is required to enable the local community to include local activities and facilities as noncash grants-in-aid.

Urban renewal areas involving colleges

Section 319: Adds a new section 112 to the Housing Act of 1949 to (1) remove "predominantly residential" requirement in areas involving an educational institution; (2) permit credit toward the locality's one-third share of expenditures made by the educational institution in purchasing property and in clearing the property; (3) permit the expenditure to be counted toward a community's local share provided the expenditure is made no more than 5 years prior to the signing of the loan and grant contract for the urban renewal project.

Urban planning

Section 320: (a) Amends section 701 of the Housing Act of 1954 (grants to assist urban planning) to extend the scope of the urban planning grant to (1) include any group of adjacent communities, having a total population of less than 50,000, and having common or related urban planning problems; (2) include a county or a group of counties; and (3) include municipalities having a population of less than 50,000.

(b) Amends section 701 to increase the authorization for grants to assist urban planning from $10 million to $20 million.

Investments by banks in long-term obligations of local public agencies

Section 321: Amends section 24, title XII of the United States Code (the National Bank Act) to permit national banks and State member banks (to the extent permitted by State laws) of the Federal Reserve System to purchase or underwrite obligations of local public agencies having a maturity of more than 18 months.

TITLE IV—LOW-RENT HOUSING

Declaration of policy

Section 401: Amends section 1 of the U.S. Housing Act of 1937 to add the following policy objectives: to make adequate provision for larger families and for families consisting of elderly persons; where a local housing authority has determined that the acquisition and repair, rehabilitation or remodeling of existing dwellings by the local public agency for use as a low-rent housing project is in the public interest of the community, the Public Housing Commissioner and the Housing and Home Finance Administrator shall encourage and facilitate such undertakings; to vest in local housing authorities full responsibility for the establishment of rents and eligibility requirements (subject to income limit ceilings provided in the act); and to authorize local housing authorities to permit families whose income increases beyond the limits for continued occupancy to remain in their homes either through group or individual purchase, or as tenants paying a nonsubsidized rent if private housing is not available to them.

Rents and income limits

Section 402: Amends several sections of the U.S. Housing Act of 1937 to permit local housing authorities to set rents and income limits for their low-rent projects, subject to a statutory ceiling on income limits.

(a) and (b) are technical, amending sections 2(1) and 15(7)(b) to delete provisions to be covered by other sections of the act.

(c) amends section 15(8)(a) to authorize the local agency to fix maximum income limits for admission and continued occupancy. The statutory ceiling would differ from existing law in two respects: (1) the present $100 exemption for each minor or adult dependent is eliminated; (2) the 20-percent gap requirement is waived for displaced families. It also removes the Public Housing Administration's authority to require the prior approval of specific income limits set by the local agency.

(d) and (e) amend sections 15(8)(b) and 15(8)(d) to remove references to the Public Housing Administration's power of prior approval of specific income limits.

(f) repeals section 502(b) of the Housing Act of 1948, relating to the exemption of benefits for disability or death occurring in connection with military service, which is incorporated in the basic act by subsection (c) above.

Central administrative office facilities

Section 403: Amends section 2(5) of the act of 1937 to permit a local public housing agency to furnish administrative facilities to the local urban renewal agency, at economic rent, in localities where the public housing agency and the local public agency operate as separate legal entities but with a common administrative staff.

Use of existing dwellings

Section 404: Provides that where a local housing authority determines and certifies to the Public Housing Commissioner and to the Housing and Home Finance Administrator that the acquisition and repair, rehabilitation or remodeling of existing dwellings for use as a low-rent housing project, the Commissioner and the Administrator shall employ the powers, functions, and duties vested in them by the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, or any other act in such manner as shall facilitate and encourage the undertaking and carrying out of such a low-rent housing project by such local public housing agency, and the annual report of the Administrator shall include information on the number of such cases and the manner in which such functions, powers, and duties were so employed and exercised in such cases.

Authorization

Section 405: Amends section 10(i) of the act of 1937 by increasing the authorization for new annual contribution contracts by an additional 35,000 units to become available July 1, 1959. It would also extend by 2 years the period during which the existing authorizations would be available. This would make available for 2 additional years, until July 31, 1960, any units not contracted for under the first authorization of 35,000 units which expired July 31, 1958, would extend the second authorization of 35,000 units to June 30, 1961, and make the new authorization of 35,000 units available until June 30, 1963.

Overincome tenants

Section 406: (a) Amends section 15(8) of the U.S. Housing Act of 1937 by adding a new paragraph (e) to stipulate the terms on which a low-rent dwelling unit may be sold to a public housing tenant. The tenant would be required to pay local taxes, amortize the full purchase price of his home, and pay interest at not less than the cost of money to the local agency. The local agency would have an option to repurchase a dwelling if the family fails to carry out its contract. This plan is permissive with local agencies. If any agency finds it is not feasible to operate under this plan, it could permit overincome tenants to remain in occupancy if the local agency determines that it is impossible for the family to rent or buy a decent private dwelling, and if an unsubsidized rent is paid.

(b) Technical: Amends the act in a number of places to make possible the sale of low-rent units.

Amendments to existing contracts

Section 407: Amends the U.S. Housing Act of 1937 by adding a new section 30 to provide that existing annual contribution contracts shall be revised, upon request of local agencies, in accordance with the terms of the act of 1937 as it is amended at any time, provided that the interest of the holders of outstanding bonds is not jeopardized.

Low-rent housing in urban renewal areas

Section 408: (a) Amends section 107 of the Housing Act of 1949 to facilitate the development of low-rent housing in urban renewal areas. Under existing law, when a new public housing project is located outside of an urban renewal area, the locality is required to make a local contribution in the form of tax exemption, but if located within an urban renewal area a further local contribution is required equal to one-third of the writedown in land value. The proposed amendment would eliminate this difference by accepting tax exemption as the only required local contribution for low-rent projects in urban renewal areas. This provision will apply to Federal, State, and city projects.

(b) Provides that where land to be acquired as part of an urban renewal project is made available to a local housing authority as a site for a low-rent housing project assisted under the U.S. Housing Act of 1937, as amended, an amount equal to the price for such land shall be included as a part of the development cost of such low-rent housing project and paid over by the local housing authority to the local agency undertaking such urban renewal project as the purchase price for said land.

TITLE V—COLLEGE HOUSING

Section 501: Amends section 401(d) of the Housing Act of 1950 to increase the revolving fund for college housing loans by $400 million (the present ceiling is $925 million). Of the $400 million increase, $50 million is reserved for other educational facilities, increasing the reservation for this purpose from $100 million to $150 million, and $50 million is reserved for student-nurse and intern housing facilities, increasing the reservation for this purpose from $25 million to $75 million.

Section 502: Amends title IV of the Housing Act of 1950 by adding new sections 405 and 406 which authorize the Administrator to make and guarantee loans to educational institutions for the construction of new, or rehabilitation of existing classrooms, laboratories, and related facilities, including equipment and utilities. Authorizes a revolving fund of $125 million to finance the new loan program, and $125 million to finance the new guarantee program. This section also provides for the prevailing wage scale under the Davis-Bacon Act to be applicable to all construction financed with college housing loans.

TITLE VI—ARMED SERVICES HOUSING

Section 601: (a) Amends section 803(a) of the National Housing Act to extend the military housing program (secs. 803 and 809) for 1 year, until June 30, 1960.

(b) Amends section 803(b) to increase from 25 to 30 years the maximum maturity of mortgages insured under this section.

(c) Amends section 803(b) of the National Housing Act to permit the Commissioner to include the cost of nondwelling facilities as a part of the mortgage security, adequate to serve the occupants of military housing.

(d) Amends section 803(c) of the National Housing Act to permit the Commissioner to reduce insurance premiums below one-half of 1 percent per annum with respect to Wherry projects acquired by the Secretary of Defense.

Defense housing for impacted areas

Section 602: (a) Amends title VIII of the National Housing Act by adding a new section 810 to authorize the FHA Commissioner to insure mortgages on single-family and multifamily projects (not to exceed 3,000 units), the need for which is certified by the Secretary of Defense. Insurance would be on an acceptable risk rather than an economic soundness basis. The projects would be held for rental for a period of not less than 5 years unless released by the military for sale. Priority in rental or sale is given to military personnel and essential civilian personnel of the armed services as evidenced by certification issued by the Secretary of Defense.

(b) Amends section 808 of the National Housing Act to make applicable the provisions of section 227 of the National Housing Act (cost certification).

(c) Amends section 212(a) of the National Housing Act to make applicable the prevailing wage requirements of the Davis-Bacon Act.

(d) Amends section 305(f) of the National Housing Act to make section 810 mortgages eligible for purchase by the Federal National Mortgage Association under its special assistance function.

Acquisition of rental housing projects

Section 603: (a) and (b) Amend sections 404(a) and (b) of the Housing Amendments of 1955 to permit the Secretary of Defense to acquire FHA section 207 rental projects, if completed prior to July 1, 1952, and certified by the Department of Defense as necessary for military housing purposes, and to make the acquisition of such projects mandatory if section 803 housing is constructed in the area of the FHA section 207 projects.

(c) Amends section 407(f) of the act entitled "An act to authorize certain construction at military installations, and for other purposes," approved August 30, 1957, in order to exempt FHA section 207 rental projects covered by this section from being declared "substandard" because the units in such projects do not meet minimum floor area prescribed for other military housing.

TITLE VII—MISCELLANEOUS

Federal National Mortgage Association

Section 701: (a) Amends section 302(b) of the National Housing Act to increase from $15,000 to $20,000 the dollar limit for mortgages purchased under the Federal National Mortgage Association's secondary market operations. Also permits FNMA to purchase mortgages insured by FHA under section 220 of the National Housing Act in principal amounts as insured by FHA.

(b) Amends section 305(b) of the National Housing Act to extend for 2 years (until August 7, 1960) the requirement that the Federal National Mortgage Association purchase mortgages under its special assistance functions at par.

(c) Amends section 306 of the National Housing Act in order to permit the Federal National Mortgage Association to assume the ownership, servicing, and sale of certain mortgages and other obligations acquired, or to be acquired, by the PHA in connection with the liquidation of various housing projects.

(d) Amends sections 304(b), 306(b), and 310 of the National Housing Act in order to permit the Federal National Mortgage Association to invest its excess funds in Federal intermediate credit bank debentures, Federal home loan bank notes, Federal land bank bonds, and banks for cooperative debentures.

Farm housing research

Section 702: (a) Amends section 603(c) of the Housing Act of 1957 to extend the farm housing research program for a period of 3 years, beginning July 1, 1959, and authorizes an annual appropriation of $75,000.

(b) Directs the HHFA Administrator to study the housing needs of migratory farmworkers.

Surveys of public works planning

Section 703: Amends section 702 of the Housing Act of 1954 by adding a new subsection (f) to authorize the Administrator to use, in any one fiscal year, up to $50,000 of the revolving fund to conduct surveys of the status and current volume of State and local public works planning and surveys of estimated requirements for State and local public works.

Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944

Section 704: (a) Amends section 1802(d) of title 38, United States Code, to permit the VA to expand the existing class of supervised lenders to include a new category of mortgage lenders. A supervised lender is entitled to make a VA loan without prior approval by the VA. The new category would consist of approved mortgagees under the certified agency program of the FHA. The inclusion of the new category would not be automatic; each applicant must be acceptable to the VA.

(b) Amends section 803(c) of title 38, United States Code, to increase the statutory maximum interest rate on VA-guaranteed and direct home loans from 4¾ percent to 5¼ percent.

(c) Amends sections 504(c) and 514 of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to prohibit builders and lenders from participating in the VA home loan programs, if such builders or lenders have been barred from the benefits of the National Housing Act by the Federal Housing Commissioner.

(d) Amends section 513(d) of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 to provide an additional $300 million for the VA direct home loan program.

Consolidation of Lanham Act and other low-rent projects

Section 705: Amends section 606 of the act entitled "An act to expedite the provisions of housing in connection with national defense and for other purposes," approved October 14, 1950, to permit the commingling of Lanham Act and low-rent project funds and the use of all residual receipts for reduction of any Federal annual contributions contract under the consolidated contract.

Disposal of projects

Section 706: (a) Amends section 607 of the act of October 14, 1940 (Lanham Act), to authorize the PHA Commissioner to modify the terms of any contract relating to any housing projects disposed of by him to cooperatives.

(b) Amends section 406(c) of the Housing Act of 1956 to extend until January 31, 1961, the time in which military personnel may continue to occupy war housing projects PA–36011 and PA–36012 (Passayunk) which are presently owned by the Housing Authority of Philadelphia, Pa.

(c) Amends sections 12(c) and 13(e) of the U.S. Housing Act of 1937 to permit the PHA to sell three PWA low-rent projects to other than a local public agency.

Voluntary home mortgage credit program

Section 707: Amends section 610 of the Housing Act of 1954 to extend the voluntary home mortgage credit program for 2 years, until July 31, 1961.

Planning scholarships and fellowships

Section 708: Authorizes $500,000 annually for a 3-year period to be used by the HHFA Administrator to provide scholarships and fellowships in public and private nonprofit institutions of higher education for the graduate training of professional city planning and housing technicians and specialists.

Home Owner's Loan Act of 1933

Section 709: Amends section 5(c) of the Home Owner's Loan Act of 1944, as amended, to permit an insured savings and loan association to invest an amount not exceeding at any one time 5 percent of its withdrawable accounts in loans to finance the acquisition and development of land for primarily residential usage.

Hospital construction

Section 710: Revives and extends until June 30, 1960, the authority of the Housing Administrator to make hospital construction loans or grants or other payments under the Defense Housing and Community Facilities and Services Act of 1951, in cases where loans, grants or payments were denied solely because of the availability of funds for the fiscal year 1959.

CORDON RULE

In the opinion of the committee, it is necessary to dispense with the requirements of subsection 4 of rule XXIX of the Standing Rules of the Senate in order to expedite the business of the Senate in connection with this report.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for S. 57.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will not be read in its entirety, but will be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The amendment is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Housing Act of 1959".

TITLE I—FHA INSURANCE

SEC. 101. Section 2(a) of the National Housing Act is amended by striking out "on and after July 1, 1939, and prior to September 30, 1959,".

SEC. 102. (a) Section 2(a) of such Act is amended by striking out the last sentence of the first paragraph thereof.

(b) Section 203(a) of such Act is amended by striking out the colon and all that follows the colon and placing a period after the word "thereon".

(b) Sections 213(e), 222(f)(1), 221(g)(1), 222(e) and 809(e) of such Act are each amended by striking out "and (j) of section 204" and inserting in lieu thereof "(j) and (k) of section 204".

SEC. 104. Section 203(b) of such Act is amended by—

(1) striking out "$20,000" in paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "$25,000"; and

(2) striking out the period at the end of paragraph (8) and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That such 85 per centum limitation shall not be applicable if the mortgagor and mortgagee assume responsibility in a manner satisfactory to the Commissioner for the reduction of the mortgage by an amount not less than 15 per centum of the outstanding principal amount thereof in the event the mortgaged property is not, prior to the due date of the eighteenth amortization payment of the mortgage, sold to a purchaser acceptable to the Commissioner who is the occupant of the property and who assumes and agrees to pay the mortgage indebtedness."

SEC. 105. Section 204(k) of such act is amended to read as follows:

"(k) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section or of section 604 or 904 and with respect to any debentures issued in exchange for properties conveyed to and accepted by the Commissioner after the effective date of the Housing Act of 1959 in accordance with such sections, the Commissioner may: (1) include in debentures reasonable payments made by the mortgagee with the approval of the Commissioner for the purpose of protecting, operating, or preserving the property, and taxes imposed upon any deed or any other instrument by which the property was acquired by the mortgagee and transferred or conveyed to the Commissioner; (2) include in debentures as a portion of foreclosure costs (to the extent that foreclosure costs may be included in such debentures by any other provision of this act) payments made by the mortgagee for the cost of acquiring the property and conveying and evidencing title to the property to the Commissioner; and (3) terminate the mortgagee's obligation to pay mortgage insurance premiums upon receipt of an application for debentures filed by the mortgagee, or in the event the contract of insurance is terminated pursuant to section 229."

SEC. 106. Section 207 of such act is amended by—

(1) striking out in subsection (b) "(except provisions relating to housing for elderly persons)" and "(except with respect to housing designed for elderly persons, with occupancy preference therefor, as provided in the paragraph following paragraph (3) of subsection (c))";

(2) striking out in subsection (c) the first unnumbered paragraph following paragraph (3);

(3) striking out "4½ per centum" in the first sentence of the second unnumbered paragraph folowing paragraph (3) of subsection (c) and inserting in lieu thereof "5½ per centum"; and

(4) adding at the end thereof a new subsection (r) to read as follows:

"(r) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Commissioner is authorized to include in any mortgage insured under any title of this act, after the effective date of the Housing Act of 1959, a provision requiring the mortgagor to pay a service charge to the Commissioner in the event such mortgage is assigned to and held by the Commissioner. Such service charge shall not exceed the amount prescribed by the Commissioner for mortgage insurance premiums applicable to such mortgage."

SEC. 107. Section 212(a) of such Act is amended by adding before the period at the end thereof ", and any mortgage insured under sections 221(d)(4) and 230(c)(4)".

SEC. 108. Section 213(d) of such act is amended by—

(1) striking out the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Any mortgage insured under this section shall provide for complete amortization by periodic payments within such term as the Commissioner may prescribe but not to exceed 40 years and from the beginning of amortization of the mortgage, and shall bear interest (exclusive of premium charges for insurance) at not to exceed 5½ per centum per annum, on the amount of the principal obligation outstanding at any time, except that individual mortgages insured pursuant to this subsection covering the individual dwellings in the project may bear interest at such per centum per annum, not in excess of 6 per centum per annum on the amount of the principal obligation outstanding at any time, as the Commissioner finds necessary to meet the mortgage market."; and

(2) striking out the last sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Property covered by a mortgage executed by a corporation or trust of the character described in subsection (a) shall include eight or more family units. Property covered by a mortgage executed by a corporation or trust of the character described in paragraph (1) or (3) of subsection (a) of this section may include such commercial and community facilities as the Commissioner deems adequate to serve the occupants of the property."

SEC. 109. The first sentence of section 214 of such Act is amended by striking out "mortgage amounts provided in this act," and inserting in lieu thereof "mortgage amounts including increased mortgage amounts in geographical areas where cost levels require an increase) provided in this Act,".

SEC. 110. Section 218 of such Act is repealed.

SEC. 111. Section 220(d)(3) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(3) The mortgage shall—

"(A) involve a principal obligation (including such initial service charges, appraisal, inspection, and other fees as the Commissioner shall approve) in an amount not in excess of—

"(i) $25,000 in the case of a property upon which there is located a dwelling designed principally for a one- or two-family residence, or in the case of a dwelling (or dwellings) designed for more than two families, but less than twelve families, such greater amount as the Commissioner may prescribe;

"(ii) 97 per centum of $13,500 of the Commissioner's estimate of the replacement cost of the property as of the date the mortgage is accepted for insurance plus 85 per centum of such cost in excess of $13,500 but not in excess of $16,000 and 70 per centum of such cost in excess of $16,000 if the application for insurance is for construction of a proposed dwelling approved for insurance prior to the beginning of construction;

"(iii) 97 per centum of $13,500 of the Commissioner's estimate of the appraised value of the property as of the date the mortgage is accepted for insurance plus 85 per centum of such value in excess of $13,500 but not in excess of $16,000 and 70 per centum of such value in excess of $16,000 if the application for insurance covers (1) an existing dwelling, the construction of which was completed more than one year preceding the date of the application for insurance, or (2) a dwelling which is to be rehabilitated with the mortgage proceeds;

"(iv) 90 per centum of $13,500 of the Commissioner's estimate of the appraised value of the property as of the date the mortgage is accepted for insurance plus 85 per centum of such value in excess of $13,500 but not in excess of $16,000 and 70 per centum of such value in excess of $16,000 if the application for insurance covers (1) a dwelling under construction at the time the application is filed, or (2) an existing dwelling, the construction of which was completed within one year prior to the date of the application for insurance;

"(v) 85 per centum of any mortgage amount computed under the foregoing provisions of this subparagraph (A) if the mortgagor is not the occupant of the property: Provided, That such 85 per centum limitation shall not be applicable if the mortgagor and mortgagee assume responsibility in a manner satisfactory to the Commissioner for the reduction of the mortgage by an amount not less than 15 per centum of the outstanding principal amount thereof in the event the mortgaged property is not, prior to the due date of the eighteenth amortization payment of the mortgage, sold to a purchaser acceptable to the Commissioner who is the occupant of the property and who assumes and agrees to pay the mortgage indebtedness;

"(B)(i) not exceed $12,500,000, or, if executed by a mortgagor coming within the provisions of paragraph (2)(B) of this subsection (d), not exceed $50 million;

"(ii) not exceed (in the case of a property or project approved for mortgage insurance prior to the beginning of construction) the Commissioner's estimate of the replacement cost of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed (the replacement cost may include the land, the proposed physical improvements, utilities within the boundaries of the land, architect's fees, taxes, interest during construction, and other miscellaneous charges incident to construction and approved by the Commissioner, but shall not include any allowance for builder's or sponsor's general overhead and profit);

"(iii) not exceed 90 percent of the Commissioner's estimate of the value of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed if the proceeds of the mortgage are to be used for the repair or rehabilitation of a project or property; and

"(iv) not exceed, for such part of the property or project as may be attributable to dwelling use (excluding exterior land improvements as defined by the Commissioner), $2,250 per room (or $8,100 per family unit if the number of rooms in such property or project is less than four per family unit). The Commissioner may, in his discretion, increase the dollar amount limitation of $2,250 per room to not to exceed $2,700 per room and the dollar amount limitation of $8,100 per family unit to not to exceed $8,400 per family unit, as the case may be, to compensate for the higher costs incident to the construction of elevator-type structures and may, in his discretion, increase any of the foregoing dollar amount limitations by not to exceed $1,000 per room without regard to the number of rooms being less than four, or four or more, in any geographical area where he finds that cost levels so require.

"(v) include such nondwelling facilities as the Commissioner deems adequate to serve the needs of the occupants of the property and of other housing in the neighborhood."

SEC. 112. Section 221 of such Act is amended by—

(1) inserting in the first proviso of the second sentence of subsection (a) the word "reasonable" immediately preceding the word "preference";

(2) striking out "$10,000" in paragraph (2) of subsection (d) and inserting in lieu thereof "$12,000";

(3) striking out paragraph (3) of subsection (d) and inserting the following new paragraph (3):

"(3) if executed by a mortgagor which is a private nonprofit corporation, association, or organization acceptable to the Commissioner, not exceed—

"(i) $12,500,000; and

"(ii) $9,000 per family unit for such part of such property or project as may be attributable to dwelling use except that the Commission may increase this amount to not to exceed $10,000 in any geographical area where he finds that cost levels so require; and

"(iii) the Commissioner's estimate of the replacement cost of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed in the case of a property or project approved for mortgage insurance prior to the beginning of construction (the replacement cost may include the land, the proposed physical improvements, utilities within the boundaries of the land, architect's fees, taxes, interest during construction, and other miscellaneous charges incident to construction and approval by the Commissioner); or

"(iv) the Commissioner's estimate of the value of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed if the proceeds of the mortgage are to be used for the repair or rehabilitation of a property or project;";

(4) inserting the following new paragraph (4) in subsection (d) and renumbering paragraph (4) to be paragraph (5):

"(4) if executed by a mortgagor which is not a nonprofit organization, not exceed—

"(i) $12,500,000; and

"(ii) $9,000 per family unit for such part of such property or project as may be attributable to dwelling use except that the Commissioner may increase this amount to not to exceed $10,000 in any geographical area where he finds that cost levels so require; and

"(iii) the Commissioner's estimate of the replacement cost of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed in the case of a property or project approved for mortgage insurance prior to the beginning of construction (the replacement cost may include the land, the proposed physical improvements, utilities within the boundaries of the land, architect's fees, taxes, interest during construction, and other miscellaneous charges incident to construction and approved by the Commissioner, but shall not include any allowance for builder's or sponsor's general overhead or profit); or

"(iv) 90 per centum of the Commissioner's estimate of the value (as of the date the mortgage is accepted for insurance) of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed if the proceeds of the mortgage are to be used for the repair or rehabilitation of a property or project;";

(5) striking out the period at the end of subsection (d) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the following new paragraphs (6) and (7):

"(6) in the case of mortgages meeting the requirements of paragraphs (3) or (4) of this section, cover a property or project for use as rental accommodations for twelve or more families eligible for occupancy as provided in this section; and

"(7) in the case of mortgages meeting the requirements of such paragraphs (3) or (4), be executed by a mortgagor approved by the Commissioner. The Commissioner may in his discretion require such mortgagor to be regulated or restricted as to rents, sales, charges, capital structure, rate of return and methods of operation, and for such purpose the Commissioner may make such contracts with and acquire, for not to exceed $100, such stock or interest in any such mortgagor as the Commissioner deems necessary to render effective such restriction or regulation. Such stock or interest shall be paid for out of the Section 221 Housing Insurance Fund and shall be redeemed by the mortgagor at par upon the termination of all obligations of the Commissioner under the insurance.";

(6) inserting the following before the period at the end of subsection (f): "and may include such commercial and community facilities as the Commissioner deems adequate to serve the occupants"; and

(7) striking out "paragraph (3)" in paragraph (2) of subsection (g) and inserting in lieu thereof "paragraph (3) or (4)".

SEC. 113. Section 227 of such Act is amended by—

(1) striking out clause (iv) in subsection (a) and everything following clause (iv) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "(iv) under section 221 if the mortgage meets the requirements of paragraph (3) or (4) of subsection (d) thereof, or (v) under section 230;" and

(2) striking out in subsection (c) the last two sentences and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "In the case of a mortgage insured under section 220(d)(3)(B)(ii) or section 221(d)(4)(iii), the 'actual cost' computed pursuant to the provisions of this paragraph (c) shall not include the allowances for general overhead items and builder's profit set forth in clause (i) of this subsection."

SEC. 114. Title II of such Act is amended by adding the following at the end thereof:

"Voluntary termination of insurance

"SEC. 229. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act and with respect to any mortgage heretofore or hereafter insured under this Act, the Commissioner is authorized to terminate any mortgage insurance contract upon request by the mortgagor and mortgagee and upon payment of such termination charge as the Commissioner determines to be equitable, taking into consideration the necessity of protecting the various insurance funds. Upon such termination mortgagors and mortgagees shall be entitled to the rights, if any, to which they would be entitled under this Act if the insurance contract were terminated by payment in full of the insured mortgage."

SEC. 115. Title II of such Act is amended by adding the following at the end thereof:

"Housing for the elderly

"SEC. 230. (a) The purpose of this section is to assist in relieving the shortage of housing for elderly persons and to increase the supply of rental housing for elderly persons.

"For the purposes of this section—

"(1) the term 'housing' means a project or property having eight or more new or rehabilitated living units, specially designed for the use and occupany of elderly persons;

"(2) the term 'elderly person' means any person, married or single, who is sixty years of age or more;

"(3) the terms 'mortgage', 'mortgagee', 'mortgagor', and 'maturity date' shall have the meanings set forth in section 207 of this Act.

"(b) The Commissioner is authorized to insure any mortgage (including advances on mortgages during construction) in accordance with the provisions of this section upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe and to make commitments for insurance of such mortgages prior to the date of their execution or disbursement thereon.

"(c) To be eligible for insurance under this section, a mortgage to provide housing for elderly persons shall—

"(1) involve a principal obligation in an amount not to exceed $12,500,000, or, if executed by Federal or State instrumentalities, municipal corporate instrumentalities of one or more States, or nonprofit development or housing corporations restricted by Federal or State laws or regulations of State banking or insurance departments as to rents, charges, capital structure, rate of return, and methods of operation, not to exceed $50 million;

"(2) not exceed, for such part of such property or project as may be attributable to dwelling use, $8,100 per living unit: Provided, That the Commissioner may, in his discretion, increase the dollar amount limitation of $8,100 per unit to not to exceed $8,400 per unit to compensate for the higher costs incident to the construction of elevator-type structures and may increase each of the foregoing dollar amount limitations by not to exceed $1,000 per room in any geographical area where he finds that cost levels so require;

"(3) if executed by a mortgagor which is a private nonprofit corporation, association or organization acceptable to the Commissioner, involve a principal obligation not in excess of 90 percent of the amount which the Commissioner estimates will be the replacement cost of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed (the replacement cost may include the land, the proposed physical improvements, utilities within the boundaries of the land, architect's fees, taxes, interest during construction, and other miscellaneous charges incident to construction and approved by the Commissioner);

"(4) if executed by a mortgagor approved by the Commissioner which is not a nonprofit corporation, association, or organization, involve a principal obligation not in excess of 90 percent of the Commissioner's estimate of the value of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed (the Commissioner may in his discretion require such mortgagor to be regulated or restricted as to rents, sales, charges, capital structure, rate of return, and methods of operation, and for such purpose the Commissioner may make such contracts with and acquire, for not to exceed $100, such stock or interest in any such mortgagor as the Commissioner deems necessary to render effective such restriction or regulation. Such stock or interest shall be paid for out of the Housing Insurance Fund and shall be redeemed by the mortgagor at par upon the termination of all obligations of the Commissioner under the insurance);

"(5) provide for complete amortization by periodic payments within such term as the Commissioner shall prescribe;

"(6) bear interest (exclusive of premium charges for insurance) at not to exceed 5½ per centum per annum on the amount of the principal obligation outstanding at any time;

"(7) cover a property or project which is approved for mortgage insurance prior to the beginning of construction or rehabilitation, which is specially designed for the use and occupany of elderly persons in accordance with standards established by the Commissioner, and which may include such commercial and special facilities as the Commissioner deems adequate to serve the occupants.

"(d) The Commissioner may consent to the release of a part or parts of the mortgaged property from the lien of any mortgage insured under this section upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, and shall prescribe such procedures as in his judgment are necessary to secure to elderly persons a preference or priority of opportunity to occupy such property.

"(e) The provisions of subsections (d), (e), (f), (g), (h), (i), (j), (k), (l), (m), (n), and (p) of section 207 of this Act shall apply to mortgages insured under this section, and all references therein to section 207 shall refer to this section."

SEC. 116. Section 512 of such Act is amended by adding the following at the end thereof: "For the purposes of compliance with this section the Commissioner's notice of a proposed determination under this section shall be considered to have been received by the interested person or firm if the notice is properly mailed to the last known address of such person or firm."

SEC. 117. Section 802 of such Act is amended by—

(1) striking out "June 30, 1959" in subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1960";

(2) striking out the second sentence in paragraph (3) of subsection (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The mortgage shall provide for complete amortization by periodic payments within such term as the Commissioner shall prescribe, but not to exceed thirty years from the beginning of amortization of the mortgage, and shall bear interest (exclusive of premium charges for insurance) at not to exceed 5½ per centum per annum of the amount of the principal obligation outstanding at any time.";

(3) adding at the end of said paragraph (3) the following: "The property or project may include such nondwelling facilities as the Commissioner deems adequate to serve the occupants."; and

(4) adding at the end of subsection (c) the following: "The Commissioner is further authorized to reduce the amount of premium below one-half of 1 per centum per annum with respect to any mortgage acquired by the Secretary of Defense or his designee if the mortgage is insured pursuant to the provisions of this title as in effect prior to August 11, 1955.".

TITLE II—FEDERAL NATIONAL MORTGAGE ASSOCIATION

SEC. 201. Section 302(b) of the National Housing Act is amended by striking out everything following "(3)" and inserting in lieu thereof "except with respect to mortgages insured under section 803 or mortgages covering property located in Alaska, Guam, or Hawaii, the Association may not purchase any mortgage if the original principal obligation thereof for each family residence or dwelling unit covered by the mortgage exceeds or exceeded $20,000 in the case of a mortgage offered for purchase under section 304, or $15,000 in the case of a mortgage offered for purchase under section 305."

SEC. 202. Section 305(b) of such act is amended by striking out everything following the first sentence thereof, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Subject to the provisions of this section, the prices to be paid by the Association for mortgages purchased in its operations under this section shall be established from time to time by the Association. The Association shall impose charges or fees for its services under this section with the objective that all costs and expenses of its operations under this section should be within its income derived from such operations and that such operations should be fully self-supporting."

SEC. 203. (a) Sections 304(b) and 306(b) of such Act are amended by striking out "and bonds or other obligations of, or bonds or other obligations guaranteed as to principal and interest by, the United States" and inserting in lieu thereof "and obligations of the United States or guaranteed thereby, or obligations which are lawful investments for fiduciary, trust, or public funds".

(b) Section 310 of such Act is amended by striking out "in bonds or other obligations of, or in bonds or other obligations guaranteed as to principal and interest by, the United States" and inserting in lieu thereof "in obligations of the United States or guaranteed thereby, or in obligations which are lawful investments for fiduciary, trust, or public funds".

SEC. 204. (a) Section 306 of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following subsection:

"(e) Notwithstanding any of the provisions of this Act or of any other law, the Association is authorized, under the aforesaid separate accountability, to make commitments to purchase and to purchase, service, or sell any mortgages offered to it by the Housing and Home Finance Administrator or the Housing and Home Finance Agency, or by such Agency's constituent units or agencies or the heads thereof, after such Administrator has found the acquisition thereof by the Association to be in the interest of the efficient management and liquidation of the mortgages. There shall be excluded from the total amounts set forth in subsection (c) hereof the amounts of any mortgages purchased by the Association pursuant to this subsection."

(b) In connection with the sale of any mortgages to the Federal National Mortgage Association pursuant to section 306(e) of the Federal National Mortgage Association Charter Act, the Housing and Home Finance Administrator is authorized, and any other official, unit, or agency selling such mortgages thereunder is directed, to transfer to the Association from time to time, from authorizations, limitations, and funds available for administrative expenses of such official, unit, or agency in connection with the same mortgages, such amounts thereof as said Administrator determines to be required for administrative expenses of the Association in connection with the purchase, servicing, and sale of such mortages: Provided, That no such transfer shall be made after a budget estimate of the Association with respect to the same mortgages has been submitted to and finally acted upon by the Congress.

TITLE III—URBAN RENEWAL

SEC. 301. Section 101(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence as follows: "The Administrator shall particularly encourage the utilization of local public agencies established by the States to operate on a statewide basis in behalf of small communities within the State, whenever that arrangement provides an effective solution to community development or redevelopment problems in such communities, and is approved by resolution or ordinance of the governing bodies of the affected communities."

SEC. 302. Section 102(a) of such act is amended by striking out in the second sentence the words "as part of the gross project cost" and inserting in lieu thereof "for such purposes."

SEC. 303. (a) Section 102(c) of such act is amended by—

(1) Inserting "feasibly, as determined by the Administrator," after "obtain";

(2) striking out "it may do so with the consent of" and inserting in lieu thereof "it shall do so under terms approved by"; and

(3) striking out "repayment of" and inserting in lieu thereof "repayment of the principal of and the interest on".

(b) Section 102(e) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(e) The total amount of loan contracts outstanding at any one time under this title shall not exceed the aggregate of the estimated expenditures to be made by local public agencies as part of the gross project cost of the projects assisted by such contracts. To obtain funds for advance and loan disbursements under this title, the Administrator may issue and have outstanding at any one time notes and obligations for purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury in an amount which shall not, unless authorized by the President, exceed $1,000,000,000, it being the intention of this section that, to the fullest extent determined to be feasible by the Administrator, local public agencies shall obtain loan funds from sources other than the Federal Government, including such funds obtained in accordance with subsection (c). For the purpose of establishing unpaid obligations as of a given date against the authorization contained in the preceding sentence, the Administrator shall estimate the maximum amount to be required to be borrowed from the Treasury and outstanding at any one time with respect to loan commitments in effect on such date."

SEC. 304. (a) Section 103(a) of such Act is amended by striking out the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The aggregate of capital grants with respect to all the projects of a local public agency on which contracts for capital grants have been made under this title shall not exceed the total amount obtained by adding together the amounts for each such project determined by multiplying its net project cost by the applicable percentage. Such percentage, which shall apply to each project receiving initial Federal recognition during the period specified, shall be 66⅔ per centum for the period prior to July 1, 1960; 60 per centum for the period between July 1, 1959, and June 30, 1960, inclusive; 55 per centum for the period between July 1, 1960, and June 30, 1961, inclusive; and 50 per centum for any time thereafter: Provided, That the percentage for any project for which no planning advance or grant is received and retained by the local public agency and which the Administrator, at the request of such agency, may approve on a three-fourths capital grant basis shall be 75 per centum, or such lesser percentage as the Administrator determines to be generally consistent with the percentage of net project costs hereunder applicable at the time to projects not so approved."

(b) Section 104 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 104. Every contract for capital grants under this title shall require local grants-in-aid in connection with the project involved which, together with the local grants-in-aid to be provided in connection with all other projects of the local public agency on which contracts for capital grants have theretofore been made, will be at least equal to the difference between the aggregate net project costs involved and the sum described in the second sentence of section 103(a)."

SEC. 305. (a) The first sentence of section 103(b) of such Act is amended by (1) inserting after "$1,450,000,000" the following: ", which limit shall be increased by $250,000,000 on July 1 in each of the years 1958, 1959, and 1960 and by $200,000,000 on July 1 in each of the years 1961, 1962, and 1963", and (2) inserting in the proviso after "such limit" the following: ", and any such authorized increase therein,".

(b) The last sentence of section 103(b) of such Act is amended by inserting the following before the period at the end thereof: ": Provided, That any amounts so appropriated shall also be available for repaying to the Secretary of the Treasury, for application to notes of the Administrator, the principal amounts of any funds advanced to local public agencies under this title which the Administrator determines to be uncollectible because of the termination of activities for which such advances were made, together with the interest paid or accrued to the Secretary (as determined by him) attributable to notes given by the Administrator in connection with such advances, but all such repayments shall constitute a charge against the authorization to make contracts for grants contained in this section: Provided further, That no such determination of the Administrator shall be construed to prejudice the rights of the United States with respect to any such advance".

SEC. 306. (a) Such Act is amended by—

(1) striking out in the first sentence of section 102(d) the following: "The Administrator may make advances of funds to local public agencies for surveys of urban areas to determine whether the undertaking of urban renewal projects therein may be feasible and" and inserting in lieu thereof "Prior to July 1, 1960, the Administrator may contract to make advances of funds to local public agencies";

(2) inserting after "the Administrator" in the first sentence of the second paragraph of section 102(d) the following: ", prior to July 1, 1960,";

(3) adding the following new subsection to section 103:

"(c) The Administrator may make grants to local public agencies for the preparation or completion of community renewal programs, which may include, without being limited to, (i) the identification of slum areas or blighted, deteriorated, or deteriorating areas in the community, (ii) the measurement of the nature and degree of blight and blighting factors within such areas, (iii) determination of the financial, relocation, and other resources needed and available to renew such areas, (iv) the identification of potential project areas and, where feasible, types of urban renewal action contemplated within such areas, and (v) scheduling or programing of urban renewal activities. Such programs shall conform, in the determination of the governing body of the locality, to the general plan of the locality as a whole. The Administrator may establish reasonable requirements respecting the scope and content of such programs. No contract for a grant pursuant to this subsection shall be made unless the governing body of the locality involved has by resolution or ordinance approved the preparation or completion of the community renewal program, and the submission by the local public agency of an application for such a grant. Notwithstanding section 110(h) or the use in any other provision of this title of the term 'local public agency' or 'local public agencies' the Administrator may make grants pursuant to this subsection for the preparation or completion of a community renewal program to a single local public body authorized to perform the planning work necessary to such preparation or completion. No grant made under this subsection shall exceed a fixed percentage of the cost (as such cost is determined or estimated by the Administrator) of the preparation or completion of the community renewal program for which such grant is made. Such fixed percentage shall be the same as the percentage which would apply under section 103(a) to any capital grants for the projects involved."

(b) Section 110(d) of such act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of this subsection, in any community for which there exists a community renewal program meeting the requirements of the Administrator established pursuant to section 103(c) hereof, no subsequent donation or provision of a public improvement or public facility of a type falling within the purview of this subsection shall be deemed to be ineligible as a local grant-in-aid for any project in conformity with such community renewal program solely on the basis that the construction of such improvement or facility was commenced without notification to the Administrator and prior to Federal recognition of such project, if such construction was commenced not more than 5 years prior to the authorization by the Administrator of a contract for loan or capital grant for the project."

(c) Such act is further amended—

(1) by striking out the word "capital" in section 100, in the heading preceding section 103, the first time it appears in the first sentence of section 103(a), each place it appears in section 103(b), and in sections 106(a)(3), 106(b), 106(c)(6), and 106(c)(8);

(2) by striking out the words "for urban renewal projects" in section 100;

(3) by inserting in section 101(a) after the word "title" in the first place where it appears therein "or for grants pursuant to subsection (c) of section 103 hereof"; and

(4) by striking out of the third paragraph of section 110(c) the word "capital" each place it appears.

SEC. 307. (a) Section 103 of such Act is amended by adding the following new subsection:

"(d) After June 30, 1960, the Administrator may make planning grants to local public agencies for surveys and plans for urban renewal projects as defined in this title, including, but not limited to, (i) plans for carrying out a program of voluntary repair and rehabilitation of buildings and improvements, (ii) plans for the enforcement of State and local laws, codes, and regulations relating to the use of land and the use and occupancy of buildings and improvements, and to the compulsory repair, rehabilitation, demolition, or removal of buildings and improvements, and (iii) appraisals, title searches, and other preliminary work necessary to prepare for the acquisition of land, all in connection with the undertaking of projects. No contract for planning grant shall be made unless the governing body of the locality involved has by resolution or ordinance approved the undertaking of the surveys and plans and the submission by the local public agency of an application for such a planning grant. Notwithstanding section 110(h) or the use in any other provision of this title of the term 'local public agency' or 'local public agencies,' the Administrator may make planning grants for surveys and plans for an urban renewal project to a single local public body which has the authority to undertake and carry out a substantial portion, as determined by the Administrator, of the surveys and plans or of the contemplated project: Provided, That the application for such planning grant shows, to the satisfaction of the Administrator, that the filing thereof has been approved by the public body or bodies authorized to undertake those portions of the surveys and plans or of the project which the applicant is not authorized to undertake. No planning grant made under this subsection shall exceed a fixed percentage of the cost (as such cost is determined or estimated by the Administrator) of the surveys and plans for which such grant is made. Such fixed percentage shall be the same as the percentage which would apply under section 103(a) to any capital grants for the projects involved."

(b) Such act is amended effective July 1, 1960, to—

(1) striking out from section 101(a) "advances" and inserting in lieu thereof "planning grants";

(2) striking out subsection (d) of section 102 and redesignating subsections (e), (f), and (g) as subsections (d), (e), and (f), respectively;

(3) striking out in the last paragraph of section 110(c) "advances" and "outstanding advances", and inserting in lieu thereof "planning grants"; and

(4) inserting in clause (1) of section 110(e) after the word "undertakings", the following: "(except surveys and plans financed under section 103(d)."

(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section or section 306, the Administrator is authorized to amend, at any time after July 1, 1960, any contract for advance entered into under section 102(d) of the Housing Act of 1949, for the purpose of providing additional advances thereunder or for any other purpose necessary to the completion of the survey and planning work covered by such contract.

SEC. 308. Section 105(b) of such act is amended by adding the following before the semicolon at the end thereof: ": And provided further, That, with respect to any improvements of a type which it is otherwise authorized to undertake, any Federal agency (as defined in section 3(b) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended, and also including the District of Columbia or any agency thereof) is hereby authorized to become obligated in accordance with this subsection (b), except that clause (ii) of this subsection shall apply to such Federal agency only to the extent that it is authorized (and funds have been made available) to make the improvements involved."

SEC. 309. Section 106(e) of such act is amended by striking out all before the proviso and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Not more than 12½ percent of the grant funds provided for in this title shall be expended for capital grants in any one Senate:".

SEC. 310. Section 110(b) of such act is amended by inserting in clause (2) after "to indicate" the following: ", to the extent required by the Administrator for the making of loans and grants under this title,".

SEC. 311. Section 110(c) of such act is amended by inserting before the last paragraph thereof the following paragraph:

"Notwithstanding the first sentence of the preceding paragraph, the Administrator (i) may extend financial assistance, other than capital grants, under this title to local public agencies for projects in urban renewal areas (other than open land areas) which are not clearly predominantly residential in character and which will not be predominantly residential under the urban renewal plan therefor, and (ii) may make, and agree to make, loans to refund temporary loans for such projects, as provided in this paragraph. Any such refunding loan shall be made when the project involved has been completed, shall provide for repayment within 10 years, and shall be in an amount not exceeding the net project cost of such project. The aggregate amount of all such refunding loans outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $150 million. Except as otherwise provided in this paragraph, all loans hereunder shall be subject to the provisions of this title applicable to temporary and definitive loans. Section 102(c) is hereby made applicable to all loans authorized by this paragraph, and the Administrator shall require local public agencies to obtain loan funds from sources other than the Federal Government unless the Administrator determines in the particular case involved that such action is not feasible."

SEC. 312. Section 110(e) of such act is amended by striking out the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

" 'Gross project cost' shall comprise (1) the amount of the expenditures by the local public agency with respect to any and all undertakings necessary to carry out the projects (including the payment of carrying charges, but not beyond the point where the project is completed), and (2) the amount of such local grants-in-aid as are furnished in forms other than cash. There may be included as part of the gross project cost, under any contract for loan or grant heretofore or hereafter executed under this title, with respect to moneys of the local public agency, which are actually expended and outstanding for undertakings (other than in the form of local grants-in-aid) necessary to carry out the project, in the absence of carrying charges on such moneys, an amount in lieu of carrying charges which might otherwise have been payable thereon for the period such moneys are expended and outstanding but not beyond the point where the project is completed, computed for each 6-month period or portion thereof, at an interest rate to be determined by the Administrator after taking into consideration for each preceding 6-month period the average interest rate borne by any obligation of local public agencies for short-term funds obtained from sources other than the Federal Government in the manner provided in section 102(c): Provided, That such amount may be computed on the net total of all such moneys of the local public agency remaining expended and outstanding, less other moneys received from the project undertaken in excess of project expenditures, in all projects of the local public agency under this title, and allocated, as the Administrator may determine, to each of such projects. With respect to a project for which a contract for capital grant has been executed on a three-fourths basis pursuant to the proviso in the third sentence of section 103(a), gross project cost shall include, in lieu of the amount specified in clause (1) above, the amount of the expenditures by the local public agency with respect to the following undertakings and activities necessary to carry out such project:

"(i) acquisition of land (but only to the extent of the consideration paid to the owner and not title, appraisal, negotiating, legal, or any other expenditures of the local public agency incidental to acquiring land) disposition of land, demolition and removal of buildings and improvements, and site preparation and improvements, all as provided in paragraphs (1), (2), (3), (4), and (6) of section 110(c); and

"(ii) the payment of carrying charges related to the undertakings in clause (i) (including amounts in lieu of carrying charges as determined above), exclusive of taxes and payments in lieu of taxes but not beyond the point where such a project is completed; but not the cost of any other undertakings and activities (including, but without being limited to the cost of surveys and plans, legal services of any kind, and all administrative and overhead expenses of the local public agency) with respect to such project."

SEC. 313. Section 110(g) of such act is amended by—

(1) striking out of the first sentence "is approved" and inserting in lieu thereof "for any project under this title is authorized";

(2) inserting in the second sentence after "Any" the word "such"; and

(3) striking out of the second sentence "contract is revised or superseded by such later contract" and inserting in lieu thereof "later contract is authorized".

SEC. 314. Section 110 of such act is amended by adding the following at the end thereof:

"(k) 'Federal recognition' means execution of any contract for financial assistance under this title or concurrence by the Administrator in the commencement, without such assistance, of surveys and plans."

SEC. 315. Section 701 of the Housing Act of 1954 is amended by striking out in the last sentence "$10,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$20,000,000".

SEC. 316. The next to last sentence of paragraph 7 of section 5136 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended by striking out "prior to the maturity of such obligations (which obligations shall have a maturity of not more than eighteen months), moneys in an amount which (together with any other moneys irrevocably committed to the payment of interest on such obligations) will suffice to pay the principal of such obligations with interest to maturity thereon, which moneys under the terms of said agreement are required to be used for the purpose of paying the principal of and the interest on such obligations at their maturity" the first place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "prior to the maturity of the principal of and the interest on such obligations, moneys in an amount which (together with any other moneys irrevocably committed to the payment of interest on such obligations) will suffice to pay when due all installments of the principal of and the interest on such obligations, which moneys under the terms of said agreement are required to be used for the purpose of paying when due all installments of the principal of and the interest on such obligations".

TITLE IV—MISCELLANEOUS

SEC. 401. Section 702 of the Housing Act of 1954 is amended by adding the following new subsection:

"(f) The Administrator is authorized to use during any fiscal year not to exceed $50,000 of the moneys in the revolving fund (established under subsection (e)) to conduct surveys of the status and current volume of State and local public works planning and surveys of estimated requirements for State and local public works: Provided, That the Administrator, in conducting any such survey, may utilize or act through any Federal department or agency with its consent."

SEC. 402. (a) Section 12(c) of the United States Housing Act of 1937 is amended by striking out the word "only" in the first sentence, and by striking out the last sentence.

(b) Section 13(e) of such act is hereby amended by striking out "(except low-rent housing projects, the disposition of which is governed elsewhere in this act)" in the first sentence.

SEC. 403. Section 606 of the act entitled "An act to expedite the provision of housing in connection with national defense, and for other purposes," approved October 14, 1940, as amended, is amended—

(1) by inserting the following sentence after the first sentence of subsection (b): "If any such project is consolidated under a single annual contributions contract with any low-cost project being assisted with annual contributions under the said act, the payment of any annual contribution on account of any project so assisted shall not be deemed to be a capital grant or annual contribution with respect to any project conveyed hereunder."; and

(2) by inserting the following proviso before the semicolon at the end of subparagraph (c)(3): ": Provided, That the provisions of this subparagraph shall not be applicable to any project which is consolidated under a single contract with one or more low-rent projects being assisted under the United States Housing Act of 1937, and all income from any such project conveyed under this section may be commingled with funds of the project or projects with which it is consolidated and applied in accordance with the requirements of the consolidated contract and the provisions of section 10(c) of the said act".

SEC. 404. The use of projects PA-36011 and PA-36012 (which were conveyed to the Housing Authority of Philadelphia, Pa., under section 406(c) of the Housing Act of 1956) for the housing of military personnel and civilians employed in defense activities without regard to their income, and the giving of a preference in respect of 700 dwelling units in such projects for such military personnel as the Secretary of Defense or his designee prescribes, for a period of 6 years after the date of the conveyance of such projects, is authorized; and such use and the giving of such preferences shall not deprive such projects of their status as "low-rent housing" as that term is used and defined in the United States Housing Act of 1937 and within the meaning of that term as used in section 606(b) of the act entitled "An act to expedite the provision of housing in connection with national defense, and for other purposes", approved October 14, 1940, as amended. The Housing and Home Finance Administrator is authorized and directed to agree to any amendments to the instruments of conveyance which may be required to give effect to the purposes of this section.

SEC. 405. Section 610(a) of the Housing Act of 1954 is amended by striking out "July 31, 1959" and inserting in lieu thereof "July 31, 1961".

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield, without losing his right to the floor?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I am about to suggest the absence of a quorum; but before doing so, I wish to have an understanding with the acting majority leader. I think we should have a quorum present, because the vote which will be taken on the Capehart amendment in the nature of a substitute will be one of the important votes, since it is on a substitute for the entire committee bill. It represents the viewpoint of the administration. I believe, therefore, that all Senators should be notified, so that they may be on the floor.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, this is the bill I previously introduced. It was before the committee for several weeks and was considered by the committee. I shall not take more than 5 minutes to discuss it, perhaps even less. I do not know how much time other Senators may want, including Senators on the other side of the aisle; but, so far as I am concerned, there is a possibility that we might vote on the amendment in the nature of a substitute within 20 minutes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I had intended to make a reasonably full speech after the Senator from Indiana had concluded his remarks; but in view of what he has just said, I should be happy, indeed, to defer my speech until tomorrow, in order that all of the amendments which the Senator from Indiana intends to offer might be acted on this afternoon. I think that would make for more orderly progress.

Mr. CAPEHART. After the vote on the pending amendment in the nature of a substitute, I shall offer an amendment to substitute the emergency measure, and I shall not speak more than 3 or 4 minutes on that amendment. Then we can have a vote.

After that, I have 10 amendments to offer, if my amendments in the nature of substitutes lose. But I am sure they will not; I am very optimistic today. Then perhaps we can make some progress today in voting.

Mr. CLARK. As the Senator from Indiana knows, I have 5 amendments of my own. I shall be very happy to give way to the Sentor so that his amendments may be acted upon before I call up my own, which could very appropriately be done tomorrow.

Mr. CAPEHART. I appreciate that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana as a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President——

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes.

Mr. ELLENDER. A while ago, during debate, I asked the question as to what were the total guarantees and loans of the Government outstanding during 1958–60. I was informed, from information furnished to me by the Senator from Virginia, that it amounted to $102 billion. But, instead of that figure, it is really $104,863 million.

Mr. CAPEHART. The amount covers what, please?

Mr. ELLENDER. Outstanding loans, guarantees, and insurance for major Federal credit programs classified by the agency as programs.

Mr. CAPEHART. That is, other than FHA?

Mr. ELLENDER. No. Ninety percent of this huge total is accounted for by the Federal Housing Administration and the Veterans' Administration. It will be noted that the figures are estimates made for 1960.

Mr. President, at this point in my remarks I ask unanimous consent that the part of the budget beginning on page 959, "Loans Outstanding and Guarantees in Force," together with that portion on page 960 dealing with the same subject, and including the table, be incorporated in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the extract was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOANS OUTSTANDING AND GUARANTEES IN FORCE

The best index of the level of Federal credit programs over a period of years is provided by the total of the outstanding loans, guaranties, and insurance in force.

Outstanding loans by the end of 1960 are estimated at $22.6 billion, about $4.1 billion more than at the end of 1958. About 40 percent of the increase over the 2 years is in foreign loans by the Export-Import Bank, the International Cooperation Administration, and the Development Loan Fund. Increased housing loans, especially mortgage purchases by the Federal National Mortgage Association, account for most of the remainder. Slightly less than one-half of the loans outstanding are to foreign borrowers, including the loan of $3.4 billion to the United Kingdom, loans of $3.6 billion by the Export-Import Bank, and $3.3 billion by the International Cooperation Administration.

Guaranties and insurance in force are estimated to increase to $82.3 billion by the end of 1960. The increase of about $24 billion since the end of 1958 reflects primarily increased guaranties and insurance of mortgage loans by the Federal Housing Administration and the Veterans' Administration. These two programs account for more than 90 percent of all outstanding guaranties and insurance, and most of the remainder are obligations guaranteed by the Public Housing Administration.

The amounts shown include both the guaranteed and unguaranteed portion of outstanding loans in order to give a clearer picture of the economic impact of these programs and to tie in better with banking statistics. They do not, however, indicate the estimated contingent liability of the Federal Government, which is shown in table 6. The major program for which the contingent liability differs materially from the principal amount of the loans is the veterans loan guaranty program. By the end of 1960, the Government liability will be about $18.5 billion lower than the outstanding amount of such loans.

The probability that the Government will be called upon to take over any substantial part of the guaranteed or insured portion of outstanding loans is small, except possibly in a national financial emergency. Sizable assets are available to minimize any potential losses. Moreover, in the case of most mortgage insurance programs charging premiums, income in the past has been sufficient not only to cover expenses and current losses, but also to build up substantial reserves.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I do not think I shall need more than 5 minutes, and perhaps less. There may be others who wish to discuss the substitute which is at the desk, which is the pending business, introduced by me as a complete, 100-percent substitute for S. 57.

The issue so far as I am concerned is clear cut and crystal clear. I have been a member of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency for 15 years. I have been a supporter of housing bills each of those 15 years. I am in sympathy with the general housing legislation. I have voted for such legislation. Some parts of the program I have voted against.

The issue is clear today. The substitute which I have offered is the proposal of the President of the United States, of the administration, and of those in administrative positions to try to do only one thing. One desire is to maintain in the fiscal year 1960 a balanced budget, with the hope that we may even have a surplus. There is no intention on the part of myself or on the part of anyone else to hinder in any way whatsoever the different housing programs. There is absolutely no intention to do that at all.

It is my best judgment, it is the best judgment of the President, and it is the best judgment of those who are in charge of the Federal Housing Agency and of the VA housing, that the Congress of the United States could accept this substitute without interfering with the proper operation of the housing programs for the next fiscal year. There is sufficient latitude or sufficient authority to carry on for another 12 months under the substitute bill without hindering the program one iota.

I was a Member of the Senate, of course, last year, when the Congress passed no housing legislation except some additional authorizations. I think that year was the third best housing year in the history of the Nation. The starts in the month of December were on the basis of 1.4 million, probably one of the biggest years in history so far as starts were concerned.

There is a difference between the two bills moneywise or authorizationwise, or with respect to impact upon the Treasury for 1960.

I should like to say that we must keep in mind that housing legislation comes in three categories so far as money is concerned. First, there are provisions which call for grants. In those cases the Federal Treasury spends the money, and we never get it back and never intend to get it back. We call those grants. The second category is what we call loans. In those cases the Federal Government loans the money directly from the Treasury, and the people to whom the money is loaned pay it back.

The third category is by far the largest. I would say it represents 90 percent of the operations of FHA. It is the category in which the Federal Government does nothing more nor less than insure the mortgages. In that case if the man who takes the mortgage pays it in full, there is no cost to the Federal Government at all.

The Federal Government, through the Federal Housing Administration, charges one-half of 1 percent as a fee for insuring such mortgages, and that fund at the moment amounts to between $700 million and $800 million. There is a reserve of between $700 million and $800 million against future losses. We must keep in mind, of course, that losses might be more than $700 million or $800 million, and if they were, there would be a cost to the Treasury of whatever the additional losses happened to be.

Those are three categories. When we make grants, we spend money we never expect to get back. When we make loans, we expect to get the money back, and the record of repayment has been good, I must say in all fairness. The third category is the insurance of mortgages.

The substitute bill which is before the Senate for consideration would have an impact upon the Treasury for the fiscal year 1960 of only about $5 million. In other words, the substitute bill would add to the debt about $5 million in fiscal year 1960. That is the year about which we are concerned. We are, of course, concerned about future years, but if we balance the budget year by year we do not need to worry too much about future years.

The Senate committee bill, for which my bill is a substitute, as written would have an impact upon the Treasury of approximately $240 million. That figure is based upon the following information:

The impact from urban renewal advances would be $7 million.

The impact from urban renewal temporary loans would be nothing.

The impact from public housing planning and construction would be $21 million. That is true because the bill provides for 35,000 additional public housing units, plus the picking up of some we lost in the past, and the cost to the Treasury would be $21 million.

There would be no impact upon the budget in fiscal year 1960 for the college housing direct loans.

The impact for the college classroom direct loans is estimated at $5 million. Under the administration bill, there would be no impact.

The VA direct loans in the Senate committee bill are $300 million. The FHA, which made up the figures I am quoting, estimates that if the Congress approves the $300 million there will be a call upon that $300 million for only about $200 million.

Therefore, we have a total of $240 million under Senate bill 57. Under my substitute the figure would be about $5 million.

Mr. President, I neglected to state that the substitute is offered on behalf of the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], and myself. Under our substitute the figure would be $5 million.

Do we or do we not wish to balance the budget in the fiscal year 1960? Would it or would it not hinder the housing program to eliminate certain items? For example, we could eliminate 35,000 public housing units, and we would still have enough money to operate for the next 12 months. Moreover, there are 115,000 public housing units, either under construction or contract, that the people have not moved into yet. They are in process. We have enough money to operate for 12 months.

With respect to the VA program, Senate bill 57 provides $300 million. My substitute provides nothing. I believe we have already agreed in the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency—and the House has already voted it—to increase the interest rate to 5¼ percent. Everyone with whom I have talked is certain that with that interest rate, private industry will absorb every mortgage that is available. That is a debatable question. Nevertheless, that is the best judgment of most people.

So we come down to the question, Do we or do we not wish to say to ourselves, in connection with each bill which comes before us, "Can we make some reductions here, there, or somewhere else without hindering the program, and without working any hardship upon anyone in the United States?" Should we not ask ourselves that question with respect to each of the bills to come before us, and see if we cannot eliminate enough expenditures from them to make certain that we shall have a balanced budget?

That is the problem. We do not wish to hinder any program. We do not wish to discriminate against anyone. We do not wish to take advantage of anyone.

We would like to do all the things which are proposed, and more besides. However, it would not make any difference whether Senate bill 57 provided twice as much money for urban renewal; we would not be able to spend it. And if it provided 10 times as much, and if we could spend it, we still would not be able to solve all the blight problems in the United States.

We are all interested in eliminating slums. Over the years, under the program we are following, we will eliminate slums. Through the program which is under way, we will build a great deal of public housing. As I say, there are 115,000 units that people have not yet moved into. As we travel down the road, all of us desiring to do the right thing by the people of the United States by clearing away slums, buying houses for those who cannot afford them, accommodating veterans, farmers, and others, is it not better for the people themselves that we have a balanced budget? Is it not better to create a surplus, so that someday we can grant tax relief to all the people? Aside from the poor people who go into the housing, all these programs are for the benefit of people who pay taxes, and who ought to be as much interested as we are in balancing the budget and in a strong economy.

We have great demands from every direction for Federal expenditure of the taxpayers' money. There is no question that one can make a good point of the argument that we should increase our defense program, that we should have more missiles, more rockets, and so forth. I do not have the facts before me, but there is a demand from every direction for the expenditure of Federal funds. I do not know what the new farm bills are to cover, but why can we not, in connection with the very first bill to come before the Senate, say to curselves—all 98 of us—"Let us use our very best judgment in seeing if we cannot eliminate a great many expenditures without crippling or hindering any essential program, but giving us a balanced budget?"

That is my only reason for offering this substitute. That is the only reason for making the appeal which I am making. If we had a great deal of money, if our budget was in balance, and we had a great surplus and a very small national debt, so that we could grant our people a tax reduction, there would be no necessity for the remarks I have just made.

But that is not the situation. The situation is just the opposite. When are we going to take action? When is the time to adopt the formula I have just explained, and apply it to all the proposed legislation which comes before us? If the time is not now, when will it be? If under existing conditions, when our national income is the largest in the history of the Nation, when more people are employed than ever before, at the highest wages, when our gross national product is the largest it has ever been, if we cannot then live within a balanced budget, when can we hope to do so?

The Congress of the United States is 100 percent responsible for balanced budgets, appropriations, and authorizations.

One may say, "The President does not fight hard enough for balanced budgets," or "The President recommends this, or does this, or says that, but the administration is wasteful. It ought not to be asking for these appropriations."

Or one may say, "The administration does not push hard enough for these programs." Nevertheless, in the final analysis, we and we alone are responsible. The President cannot come here and vote. The administration cannot initiate legislation calling for appropriations or authorizing the expenditure of money. The administration can spend money only after we have appropriated it or directed that the money be borrowed from the Treasury.

That is the position in which we find ourselves. I wish I could support a more liberal program than the one I have proposed; but my conscience will not permit me to do so, in view of the fact that my conscience tells me that the amount of money in my substitute would not in any way interfere with any of our programs this year, and that we should have a balanced budget. At least we should work to that end.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield in order that I may propound a parliamentary inquiry provided he does not lose the floor?

Mr. CAPEHART. I am glad to yield under those conditions.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BUSH. If the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana is adopted, will it then be subject to further amendment by the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Parliamentarian advises the Chair that if the substitute offered by the Senator from Indiana is adopted, the bill will not thereafter be open to further amendment.

Mr. BUSH. In view of that situation, I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana if he would modify his amendment in two respects.

In the first place, with respect to the new obligational authority for the fiscal years 1963, 1964, and 1965, I should like to have him substitute, for each of those 3 years, $250 million for the figure of $200 million in the administration bill, so as to make the $250 million uniform for the 6 years.

Mr. CAPEHART. What years did the Senator refer to?

Mr. BUSH. The years 1963, 1964, and 1965.

Mr. CAPEHART. I am willing to accept that modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that, the yeas and nays having been ordered, the modification may not be made except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to accept the suggested modification. It has to do with the years 1963, 1964, and 1965. We can take a look at the situation later. The proposed modification has nothing to do with balancing the budget in 1960 and 1961—particularly 1960, which is the critical year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if under his proposed modification there would be a change in the matching formula, so that the States or local governments would have to match on a 50–50 basis.

Mr. CAPEHART. I did not understand the modification to do anything except change the amount.

Mr. SPARKMAN. In other words, it would require the local governments to match dollar for dollar?

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes. I understood the modification not to bring about a change in anything except in the amount for the 3 years.

Mr. BUSH. The stepdown in the Federal share would take place under the amendment of the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], but the purpose of my amendment is not to step down the Federal contribution in dollars. It does leave in the amendment the stepdown in the Federal share and the stepup in the State share.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Percentagewise.

Mr. BUSH. Yes.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator would like to do both. He would like to increase the amount in the substitute and——

Mr. BUSH. And leave the rest of it as it is in the administration's bill.

Mr. CAPEHART. Leave the percentage formula as it is.

Mr. BUSH. Leave the rest of it as it is in the bill that the Senator has offered as a substitute.

Mr. CAPEHART. The modification would be in effect for 1963, 1964, and 1965.

Mr. BUSH. Yes. I should now like to call the Senator's attention to this other suggested modification.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not believe the Senator's previous modification has been acted on. I merely wish to say that we ought to be certain in understanding this proposal of the Senator from Connecticut. It should be clearly understood that it would require a change in the formula whereby, instead of the Federal Government contributing two-thirds, as has been the case since the program was started, the Federal Government would now contribute 50 percent and the local government would have its contribution increased.

Mr. BUSH. But that 50 percent would only be after a step down, first, of 60 percent, the next year of 55 percent, and then a step down to 50 percent. It goes down by degrees over a period of 3 years, and State governments would be encouraged to help pay the local costs.

Mr. CAPEHART. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator modifies his amendment accordingly.

Mr. BUSH. I call the Senator's attention to another proposed modification. At an appropriate place in his substitute, I ask that there be included the following language:

Section 106 of the Housing Act of 1949 is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(h) Without limiting any authority otherwise provided in this title, any local grants-in-aid may be furnished by the State government as distinguished from other local public agencies, as herein defined. In making capital grants available for projects, priority shall be given projects in States where the State government has furnished or contracted to furnish local grants-in-aid to the project in an amount which equals or exceeds one-half the total required amount."

That is language proposed by the committee.

Mr. CAPEHART. I ask that I may modify my substitute accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator modifies his amendment accordingly.

Mr. CAPEHART. I hope we will be able to get a vote on the amendment tonight, or tomorrow. I know of no one on the Committee on Banking and Currency, on either side—and this is particularly true of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN]—who is not conscientious and sincere in trying to have enacted a workable housing bill. I wish to congratulate all members of the committee for the hard work they have put into the bill. It is a complicated subject. It is not readily or easily understood. We are dealing with a problem which has been with us for many years. I suspect it will be with us for many years to come. We ought to pass a bill which, without hindering the program, will at least stay within the President's budget.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. Would it be the Senator's intention, if the amendment in the nature of a substitute should be defeated, to offer the amendments which he submitted previously?

Mr. CAPEHART. It is my intention—of course I cannot conceive of the substitute being defeated——

Mr. KEATING. I do not mean that it should happen.

Mr. CAPEHART. I understand. I say that because I know that Senators are practical men. They understand the importance of balancing the budget and maintaining a strong economy, if it can be done without interfering with the housing program. However, if my substitute should fail, I shall offer an amendment to cover the emergency which exists with reference to FHA, so far as the balance of this year is concerned. If that fails—and again I cannot conceive of it failing—I shall offer, together with other Senators, the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], and others, the 10 amendments which are lying on each Senator's desk. Those 10 amendments, in substance, do about what the substitute bill would do. There are some exceptions, but generally speaking they do about what the substitute bill would do, except that they would do it piecemeal. We would have to cut the dog's tail off a little bit at a time with the 10 amendments.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Virginia regrets very much that the principal sponsor of the administration bill has decided to change his approach to this problem. Speaking against the Sparkman bill last Monday, the junior Senator from Virginia said that he hoped the problem could be approached free from any political partisanship and decided strictly on its merits, and that economy would not be applied as a party test.

When the committee took for consideration the five bills on this subject, it was the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], who moved that the Sparkman bill be the pending business, subject to all amendments, and that was the procedure adopted. We amended the Sparkman bill with reference to the temporary bill, with reference to S. 612, with reference to the Clark bill and with reference to some other proposals.

Then the committee reported the Sparkman bill. The junior Senator from Virginia was the only member of the committee who did not vote to report the Sparkman bill. It was not because he is opposed to urban renewal, and not because he is opposed to increasing the authorization for FHA, but solely, as he stated on Monday, because he did not want in the first action of the Senate to breach the President's so-called balanced budget. First there is doubt as to whether it will be balanced, this bill or no bill.

Assuming that the President was correct in believing that he would get a 5-cent postage rate, an additional 1½-cent increase in the gasoline tax, and have perhaps a $70 million surplus, we could not have had such a surplus. According to the first figures on the Sparkman bill, the amount exceeded the budget by $346 million.

Yesterday I was sent a report from the administrator that the Sparkman bill had been amended, and that the cash impact upon fiscal 1959 would be only $230 million. When I offered to place those figures in the RECORD, the senior Senator from Indiana said the figures were not correct. So they were not offered. Since then, we have had delivered to us a study which states that they are correct. I have not had time to analyze the study.

My objection to the change in procedure is that yesterday it was proposed to give us the privilege of voting for specific amendments, and to bring the proposal within the money-type program, without attaching all the other details which are contained in S. 612. When the committee was considering this matter we were amending the Sparkman bill. I never agreed to report S. 612. No other member of our committee agreed to report S. 612.

What is the situation now? If on the basis of party loyalty the Republicans should vote for S. 612 without knowing what is contained in the bill they will have to accept it as it is because no one knows what is in it. I myself do not know. It has been changed. If they vote for S. 612 sight unseen, they will be voting to uphold a veto. That will give us a party test. I am not here to have a party test. But if there is to be a party test, I will vote on the Democratic side. I want to have separate votes on the merits of financing a desirable program. But I do not want to increase our ability to pay or to borrow money and go into a hole, and perhaps have inflation to finance even a good thing, although it is not an essential thing.

I would be wiling to go into a "hole" for military defense, if our lives depended upon it, because a price tag cannot be put upon national security. But a price tag can be put on urban renewal; a price tag can be put on slum clearance; a price tag can be put on public housing. A price tag can also be put on surveys to provide nice facilities for communities. But a price tag cannot be put on national defense.

As I have pointed out, the committee approached the matter of amending the Sparkman bill and got that bill in good shape. It was not in the shape in which I thought it should be. It still exceeded what we had voted to provide. I am the only member of the committee who felt that way. We were given to understand that all of us who wanted to vote for economy could vote on specific questions of economy without all the details which have been proposed as additions to the bill.

There was the subject of the removal of all ceilings on FHA housing. There was the question whether there should be an increase to 4.8 percent or 5.5 percent in FHA loans, or no authorization at all. There was the question of giving reasonable preference to those who wanted to go into low-rent housing. There was the question of fixing the purchase price and charges under the FNMA special assistance program.

No one knows what is contained in the substitute amendment at the desk. If the sponsors sat up all night, unless they had some experts to work with them, they would not know by tomorrow what was in it.

But if we say that there is an urban renewal program which will cost $200 million a year, and that there is another one which will cost $300 million a year, then we will know what we are doing.

If it is said that here is a program to provide for 10,000, 15,000, or 20,000 new public housing units, or a program for 45,000 public housing units, which will cost, in 40 years, more than $800 million, we will know what we are doing.

I do not want to labor the question, but tomorrow I shall be better prepared to point out what is in the proposal. Certainly I shall have a better opportunity than any Senator who is not a member of our committee to know what is in the proposal.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator from Virginia said the bill had not been considered. It was introduced 4 weeks ago. It was considered, along with all the other bills, by the full committee. In fact, the table or chart from which the committee worked had an explanation of every feature of each bill. So the bill had due consideration in the committee.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The Senator from Indiana was not too accurate in quoting me. I did not say the bill was not considered. I said that on motion of the Senator from Indiana, the Sparkman bill was made the pending business of our committee. The other bills were offered as amendments when we reached them. There was never any independent consideration of S. 612 as a separate bill. The same is true of the Clark bill. The same is true of other amendments which were offered to the other provisions of the committee bill.

We thought we would have a center line. First I made a motion to exclude matters which were not germane to housing, but that motion was rejected. The motion made by the Senator from Indiana to make the Sparkman bill the pending business, and then to amend the Sparkman bill, was adopted. Now the Senator from Indiana is leaving that position to get a test vote on S. 612, to see who will support a veto.

No one will know what is in that bill. If Senators vote for it without knowing what is in it, then they will support a veto. If they do not, it will be a matter of guesswork.

Mr. CAPEHART. I do not like to have it said of me that I was not a gentleman in the committee. There was considerable argument as to what we should do and how we should proceed. Finally, I made the suggestion that, in order to get moving, we place S. 57 before us and use it as the committee bill for purposes of amendment. The committee is composed of 10 Senators from the other side of the aisle and only 5 from this side of the aisle. So the Senators on the minority side did not have the necessary votes to do other than what the committee desired.

The able Senator from Virginia was kind enough to give me his proxy all day on Monday. I voted his proxy all day Monday for economy proposals and many other changes for which he wished me to use it. I even cast his proxy vote against the bill, and made the statement that I expected to vote to permit the bill to be reported to the Senate, in order that the Senate might have it for consideration.

But I reserved the right to vote against all of it; I reserved the right to offer amendments; I reserved the right to offer substitutes, purely as a matter of accommodation to and cooperation with all Senators, in order that the Senate might proceed in an orderly way.

I have a perfect right to offer the amendment in the nature of a substitute. The able Senator from Virginia has a perfect right to vote against it. The Senator from Virginia, on Monday, when the committee was marking up the bill, made a speech in the Senate advocating, I thought, almost the same amount that is provided in the substitute amendment. Now he seems to have changed his mind. Perhaps he has not changed his mind about the money items in the bill; perhaps his objection has to do with something else in the bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I do not yield for any further speeches by the Senator from Indiana. He has again become somewhat confused about the fact that I was present during all of the session on Friday. I was present at the session on Monday until the committee had virtually completed its work on the bill. Then, because I had another committee assignment that afternoon, I left my proxy with the Senator from Indiana.

The Senate has before it a bill containing 157 pages. Every member of the committee knows that we carefully considered that bill, line by line. We argued, pro and con, all the sections in S. 57. We handled it that way. We began to handle it that way on the floor. Then, all of a sudden, when we expected amendments to bring the authorization items within the proper scope of an economy measure, we find that another bill, equally as long, is submitted for our consideration; but no one knows what is in it.

Mr. President, which is the efficient way to approach the subject? I am not going to swallow something I do not know about. If the Republican members wish to do so, let them do it; that is their privilege and their responsibility. But I insist that the only appropriate way for us to reflect our honest convictions regarding economy in respect to the housing program is to take up the Sparkman bill's provisions one by one—and that bill contains a number of provisions which I prefer to the corresponding provisions of the companion bill—and then vote those authorization provisions either up or down. Then we shall know where we stand.

On tomorrow, I probably shall have more to say. But at this time I shall conclude by pointing out that a 110-page bill has now been submitted; but at this time, only 10 minutes after it was submitted, it has already been changed by an amendment or modification. I submit that that is not the proper way to legislate on a subject such at the one we are considering.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). The Senator from Connecticut is recognized.

Mr. BUSH. First, I wish to state my great distaste for a bill of this type, in connection with housing. The bill deals with various aspects of housing, including urban renewal, college housing, college classrooms, veterans' loans, FHA insurance, residential construction, and so forth. The bill includes provisions regarding five or six separate subjects, which should be dealt with separately, so that each can be judged on its merits. I think the incorporation of all these items into one large omnibus bill is a great mistake. I protested against it last summer, when the previous housing bill was before the Senate. I protested against it in the Banking and Currency Committee only a week ago. And I protest against it now. I protest against it because I do not think it is a proper way to legislate—namely, to throw all these important items into one omnibus bill.

Furthermore, there is the danger that if one of these items is dealt with in a lopsided manner or in a way particularly unacceptable to the administration, inasmuch as the President does not have the power of item veto, the result may be to imperil the enactment of the sections of the bill which are perfectly proper. That could well be the result of lumping together the proper provisions, which the President might consider as such, and those to which he will be opposed. That is another basis of my objection.

I also object to the steps taken in the committee in trying to whip out this piece of proposed legislation. Never before, since I have been a Member of the Senate—and this is my seventh year in this body—have I sat in a committee meeting in which members have been under such pressure to rush through a piece of proposed legislation which is not emergency legislation in any sense of the word. If there were a hurry to get such a bill enacted into law, Senate bill 65, introduced by the distinguished senior Senator from Indiana, could easily have been brought up and passed by now. I do not believe it would have been controversial.

But, no; we had to go through this very large omnibus bill. The hearings were restricted; and in the committee Senators were kept with their noses to the grindstone for hour after hour, until finally we got out a bill.

Then it was hoped that it would actually be brought before the Senate and would be acted upon by the Senate even before the report on the bill was available to the Senate. Republican Senators were meeting on yesterday to consider this proposed legislation, and at that time we did not have either a copy of the bill or a report on it; but we were told that this measure would be the pending measure that day.

I protest that there is no necessity to put Senators under pressure of that type. The Senate is supposed to be a deliberative body. Mr. President, the Senate should be a deliberative body. But it cannot be a deliberative body if Senators are asked to rush through proposed legislation without having a chance to have their staffs analyze the bill and without having a chance to analyze it themselves. That is my protest.

Mr. President, I am interested in a bill for which I can vote. I think many aspects of this bill are important to the Nation. There is something valid in each of the titles of the bill, in my opinion. But I wish to have the Senate deal with a bill for which I can vote, and I wish to have the Senate consider a bill the President can sign.

This afternoon we have heard considerable debate about the budget. We have heard statements regarding the necessity of paying heed to the fiscal condition of the Nation at this very crucial time in our history.

I see no necessity, Mr. President, for us to go beyond the recommendations of an administration which has been friendly to the whole business of government in housing, and has been especially friendly to the urban renewal program, which constitutes the largest item in this bill, and to proceed to pad the bill to such an extent, which I believe exceeds the necessities of the occasion and exceeds the proprieties of the occasion, insofar as our fiscal position is concerned.

Mr. President, much has been made of the fact that the impact on the budget the very next year may not be very great. I believe that can be fairly argued, although if the Sparkman bill is passed, the budget will be violated by in excess of $200 million. Nevertheless, Mr. President, we are in the process of acting on a bill of an authorization nature, regarding expenditures which are likely to be made 6 years from now. But how do we know what expenditures will be needed at that time? I am not at all impressed by the suggestion that we go beyond the recommendations of the administration bill, to the point or the extent the Sparkman bill does—in other words, to make an increase of approximately $100 million each year for the 6 years, and also to make it possible for the total amount to be compressed into 4 years, so that under the Sparkman bill we conceivably could obligate in the next 4 years, up to $500 million each year, not $350 million. That is one of the features of the Sparkman bill which I do not believe is understood by Senators. So I hope that Senators who now are absent will have an opportunity to read these observations in the RECORD, and to realize that that is one of the features of the bill which I believe will be found most objectionable to the administration.

Finally, Mr. President, regarding the matter of the budget, I wish to state again that this is not a propaganda budget, as the majority leader has called it. Instead, it is a realistic budget. It is a realistic budget based upon the knowledge by this administration of our position in world affairs today—and that is a very dangerous position. It is a budget which is based on the desire of the administration to keep the value of our currency high, to keep it sound. It is a sound-dollar budget; and if ever a sound-dollar budget was needed in the history of the Nation, it is needed now. If ever we have been subjected in a so-called peacetime year to pressures which militate against the possibilities of a sound dollar, certainly those pressures have been brought to bear now; and unquestionably we shall continue to be subjected to them for the next 2 or 3 years.

So, Mr. President, I believe that those who take that budgetary position regarding the bill are correct; and for that reason, the Senate should stand with the administration.

Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the minority views of the distinguished senior Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT], which appear with the report on the bill, beginning on page 85. How the Senator from Utah had a chance to prepare those minority views, I do not know. I have not had a chance to prepare any minority views; and I was amazed to learn that he had found time to prepare so very excellent a presentation of minority views in regard to the Sparkman bill. I call attention particularly to page 88, where we find that the Senator from Utah comments on other objectionable provisions of the bill. He speaks of FNMA special assistance, and says—

The bill—

That is to say, the Sparkman bill—

reinstitutes for 2 years the par purchase requirement for FNMA special assistance. This is a mistake. The program is presently operating satisfactorily and the par purchase requirement would unnecessarily substitute Government financing for private financing.

I certainly endorse what the Senator from Utah has said about that, Mr. President.

I call the attention of Senators to page 155 of the hearings, where we have a report of the Federal National Mortgage Association—mortgage portfolio, commitments outstanding, net income last 6 calendar years. This information was given to the committee at the hearings, and I ask unanimous consent to have the table printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Federal National Mortgage Association—Mortgage portfolio, commitments outstanding, net income last 6 calendar years

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, the figures show that in the secondary market operations portfolios we had, at the end of the year 1958, $1,400 million worth of mortgages and outstanding commitments; and, in the total Federal Government programs other than the secondary market operations, a total of $4,053 million; or a total of $5,400 million, approximately.

It is said from time to time that the National Federal Mortgage Association operation is a profitable operation for the Federal Government. I have noted that in the last year, 1958, the net income from the secondary market operations is estimated at $11 million, and from other Government programs operation the net income is estimated at $26 million, or a total of some $37 million.

Unless my arithmetic is worse than it usually is, and that is possible—it is not very good at best—I believe those figures amount to about a return of two-thirds of 1 percent in connection with the portfolio totals I have mentioned of $5,400 million. I do not consider that a return of two-thirds of 1 percent is a very good investment for anybody.

Another point to remember is that the $5,400 million mortgages in portfolios were put there with the taxpayers' money, or else the money was borrowed at the taxpayers' credit to put the money into portfolios. So this money represents a subsidy quite similar to the farm subsidy, as a result of which we now have some $8 billion worth of surplus products in storage. Instead of farm products, in this case we have mortgages.

These mortgages are probably good, for the most part, but I quite agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT] when he states that we should not increase the mortgage portfolios or take any action in this proposed legislation which would require the administration to increase the portfolios. On the contrary, in the stringent financial conditions under which we are living, we should be taking steps to reduce this particular portfolio of mortgages.

Mr. President, I beg support for the substitute bill which has been proposed by the Senator from Indiana. It is a good program. It provides for a very generous urban renewal program, which is a very vital necessity.

I may say that in our State of Connecticut we have gone ahead with the urban renewal program, and that is true of other States of the Union. We recognize the very great importance of the program to our State. We also recognize that we have a stake in the solvency of the United States and in the integrity of the Federal budget.

I beg support of the administration bill because I think it gives generous recognition to the urban renewal program, which really was given life and impulse by this administration following the Housing Act of 1954. It is one of the items in the history of this administration which I think anybody can be proud of.

I think that concludes my observations for the present.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, earlier today I had an exchange with the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] and also the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE], with reference to the nonbudgeted items in the housing program. We are prepared now to give that figure. I have discussed the matter privately with the Senator from Florida. He asked me to put it into the RECORD. I told him I would make a statement.

Insofar as the pending bill is concerned, there is not one dollar authorized in it that is not budgeted. It is all covered in the budget. There is no break of the appropriations setup at all. The only operation in the whole housing field outside of the budget is the secondary market operations of the Federal National Mortgage Association.

By the way, just to refresh our recollections, the secondary market operations of the Federal National Mortgage Association are of a private corporation nature. In other words, persons who sell mortgages or do business with the Federal National Mortgage Association are required to buy stock—in the past it has been 3 percent; at the present time I believe it is 2 percent—of FNMA, with the idea that eventually the agency will be privately owned.

The Federal National Mortgage Association in its secondary market operations has made a profit continuously since its revised setup in the act of 1954. I have not checked this, but I believe I am correct when I state it has paid a dividend each quarter beginning in 1956. So it is a private market operation, and it is the only operation in the whole housing field, or that has anything to do with the housing field, outside of the budget.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. What the Senator is saying is that everything is within the budget. However, there are some items which have to do with unbalancing the budget.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. CAPEHART. I want to make that clear in the RECORD.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am not discussing that.

Mr. CAPEHART. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] wanted a statement with reference to the nonbudget operation. The answer is that there is nothing in the bill affecting the budget. There is nothing in the bill and there is nothing in the substitute offered by the Senator from Indiana affecting the secondary operations of the Federal National Mortgage Association.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senators brought the subject up, and the explanation is needed for the RECORD.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I wish to make one correction. I said there was nothing having to do with the secondary operations, and I will modify that to the extent of saying that we raised the ceiling or the maximum mortgage which could be purchased from $15,000 to $20,000. However, there is nothing affecting capitalization or the money operation.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I appreciate the Senator's advising the Senate as he has. I, too, have checked on the matter since our colloquy earlier in the afternoon. I find that the item which the Senator mentions and which is not in the budget represents expenditures by FNMA in fiscal year 1959 of $359 million, so they say, and estimated expenditures in fiscal year 1960 of $485 million. In neither case would that be included within the terms of the announced budget.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. CAPEHART. There is nothing in the pending bill to increase it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It does not affect the budget, and it is a private operation.

Mr. HOLLAND. As I understand the situation, the Senator from Alabama advised us there was nothing in the bill which would increase the amount.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. Unless it might be increased by the greater trading.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is the action of FNMA. Nothing in the bill requires greater trading.

Mr. HOLLAND. But the bill does increase the number of mortgages with which they are permitted to deal?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The bill would increase the maximum which may be paid for any single mortgage. Formerly, it was $15,000, and at the request of FNMA it has been raised to $20,000.

Mr. HOLLAND. Any increase in the estimated $485 million, which they report for this item, would have to come from the source which the Senator just indicated, would it not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CAPEHART obtained the floor.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Have the yeas and nays been ordered on the substitute?

Mr. CAPEHART. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. President, before I renew my suggestion of the absence of a quorum, I wish to state that with the exception of the minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN], who I think will take only a short time, we on this side are ready to vote. I am hopeful we can possibly get a vote today.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, first of all, it is my understanding that the yeas and nays have been ordered on the pending substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is also my understanding that the pending amendment is a substitute for the so-called Sparkman bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], for himself and other Senators, for the committee amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I shall be very brief, and thereafter I believe we can proceed to a vote.

I believe that the issue is pretty clear, but I thought one or two things should be made abundantly clear. I listened with interest to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] who said that it was his understanding that we would perfect the Sparkman bill, and that no substitute would be offered. I know of no such understanding. I know of no one who could contrive such an understanding. I know of no one in this Chamber who would be authorized to enter into that kind of understanding, because any Member could rise in his place and, as a substitute, offer the administration bill. That is precisely what is before us at the present time.

I thought an effort was made to make it appear that this amendment was in the nature of a political tactic. I can certainly assure my distinguished friend from Virginia that nothing could be further from the thoughts of the minority leader; and I have heard no such sentiment expressed by the minority members of the Committee on Banking and Currency—neither by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], or the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT], or any other member.

This substitute was agreed upon among ourselves in order that we might have a vote upon an integrated housing bill which represents the administration's viewpoint. There is nothing political or partisan in that approach, and I think it is a very proper approach and a very proper thing for the minority to do, namely, to assert, for its own administration, the viewpoint which it takes upon the entire housing problem, which is now pending before us.

The point was made also that there was a very lengthy substitute bill before us, with which no one was familiar. In the first place, there are no 150 pages in the Sparkman bill. There are no 150 pages in the Capehart-Bennett-Bush bill, the administration bill. I believe that if anyone will take the trouble to examine it, he will find that it contains only 42 pages, which is a long way from 150 pages. It seems to me that if a person does his homework well, he will have no difficulty in getting through a 48-page bill. I have done so, and I am not a member of the committee. In addition, I have had occasion to examine a good many tables and prepared statistics showing the differences between the two proposals.

So when it is indicated that we have no familiarity with what is in the substitute, I am afraid that is considerably wide of the mark. We have had two conferences in which most of the time was devoted to the question of housing. There came before us those who were familiar with the operational end of the business. So we have some familiarity with what is in the substitute.

With respect to the administration bill, let me say that years ago we established a Housing and Home Finance Agency. As of the present time, there are in that Agency, roughly, 10,980 employees. That is almost equivalent to a division in the U.S. Army. There are 10,980 employees scattered at the department level in Washington, and scattered through 100 field offices from one end of the country to the other, and perhaps beyond. That constitutes a rather formidable force for gathering background knowledge and developing experience on every facet and every aspect of the housing field.

Those who man the directors' offices in the various States, whether they be in the voluntary mortgage organization, whether they be in the Federal housing activity or the Public Housing Authority, whether they deal with community facilities or other subjects, attend conferences—they are familiar with the mortgage market. They are familiar with credit facilities. They keep in contact with the builders. They know what the home building requirements and demands may be in a given area.

So we have a far-flung organization, with a strength of nearly 11,000, whose combined knowledge, experience, background, and skill are available when the time comes to develop a package bill to deal with various aspects of the entire housing picture.

That is precisely what has happened. One may call this proposal the President's bill if he likes; he may call it the bill of the Housing Administration; he may call it the bill of the Budget Bureau; he may call it the Capehart bill, the Bennett bill, or the Bush bill. But the fact is that it reflects a refined and distilled experience of literally thousands of people who are familiar with every aspect of the housing program.

But the substitute does something more. It is thoroughly objective. It represents a national viewpoint. The President of the United States can do nothing but send to the Congress legislation which approaches a problem from the national viewpoint, and not from the standpoint of a particular provincial or sectional interest.

I examined the list of witnesses who appeared before the committee. A college president appeared. What would be his primary interests? It would be in college housing. Certainly there is nothing sinful or wrong about that. He comes to express his interest. But that represents only a segment of the larger interest.

A spokesman for the homebuilders came before the committee. What interest did he assert? He asserted a definite and limited interest with respect to the homebuilders.

Mayors of metropolitan centers came and sat through the hearings. They included the distinguished mayor of Philadelphia. What was their primary interest? Their primary interest was the so-called urban renewal. Even the mayor of Chicago was present for that purpose.

I find no fault in that testimony. Some people say that it represents a very limited interest, as distinguished from that of the administration, which tries to see the whole picture in the large, to coordinate it, and then, within the limits and the framework of our resources and the available funds, to set up a coordinated, well integrated housing bill which covers every facet of the problem, and has a proper regard for the budget as a whole, in order that the budget in the fiscal year 1960 may be balanced. There is also involved a psychological factor.

I believe I should address these remarks particularly to my colleagues on my own side of the aisle. I refer to a psychological factor. When a hole is punched in the dike the first time major legislation is before us, how many other holes will be punched? When the bellwether comes out of the barn, the sheep all follows. Anyone who ever lived in the country knows that. So if we punch a hole in the budget line, or if we let the waters erode the top of the dike, headlines will appear to the effect that, "The President's Budget Has Been Punctured."

Another feature is involved, too. I am in favor of holding the line the best I know how, because I believe the question of the budget is of vital importance to our country and of vital importance to the dollar values and vital to the people who live on circumscribed and limited and fixed and inflexible incomes, who are the millions who get hurt unless we exercise a cautious responsibility and make sure that we leave nothing undone to prevent the erosion of the dollar.

I was interested in examining the speech of the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board after his return from Europe. He expressed alarm that confidence is a dubious thing in other countries right now, because they have said that when they find a $13 billion deficit in the greatest country on the face of the earth and it maintains that kind of deficit in an expanding economy, it can mean only one thing, and that is that there is no will and no determination to protect our fiscal integrity.

That is a rather unhappy situation, as we think of the necessity for confidence in the American dollar on the part of the people abroad, and confidence in the same dollar on the part of the people at home.

The substitute, therefore, offers an entire housing package. It covers the whole field. It is within our national resources, based upon estimated receipts. It is well coordinated. It gives balanced consideration to every item of value. It gives balanced consideration to the direct loan feature, urban renewal, mortgage money, and interest rates. Those things are not merely put together hit and miss. With a great organization of nearly 11,000 people, the best thinking has gone into it. We can be proud of the package that has been offered by the administration.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, may we have order, so that we can hear the Senator from Illinois?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There is no particular point in my laboring the matter any longer. The members of the Committee on Banking and Currency have done an excellent job in this field. The individual amendments will be ready to be directed to particular items in the bill.

However, I could not let pass without rebuttal the observation that was made, first, that there was an understanding that the substitute was not to be offered, because we know of no such understanding; secondly, that someone seeks to read partisan or political significance into the offering of the substitute. Nothing could be more remote from the fact.

Mr. President, I commend the substitute to all Members of the Senate, first, because it is balanced, sound, reasonable, and within the frame of our resources; and also because it is within the budget estimates. Those are indeed important to the well-being of this country, both now and in the future.

With those brief remarks, I am ready to proceed to vote on the substitute. Perhaps we could have a quorum call, if my distinguished friend from Montana would agree that I should suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be dispensed with.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I should like to address a brief question to the Senator from Illinois, the minority leader, if I may.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Certainly.

Mr. HOLLAND. Or to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. Am I correctly advised that——

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, may we have order? We cannot hear what is going on.

Mr. HOLLAND. Am I correctly advised that the substitute bill upon which we are about to vote contains a provision reducing the required Federal contribution for urban renewal payments from the present level of two-thirds?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Parliamentarian informs the Chair that the Senate is now in a situation where no debate is in order.

Mr. HOLLAND. I am merely asking a question of the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is now proceeding with a call of the roll.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I had asked that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CAPEHART. The answer to the question of the Senator from Florida is that it does reduce the contribution to 50 percent at the end of 3 years.

Mr. HOLLAND. It is now two-thirds.

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes. In the first year it would be 60 percent; then 55 percent, and then 50 percent.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] in the nature of a substitute, as modified. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD: I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] would each vote "nay."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 58, not voting 8, as follows:

NOT VOTING—8

So Mr. CAPEHART's amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I call up my amendment designated "2–3–59–I" and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 405 relating to additional low-rent housing units.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAPEHART. The amendment would strike out all the so-called public housing units for fiscal year 1960. We would save the Treasury $21 million in 1960. The reason for that is very, very simple. They say they have sufficient funds with which to operate for the next 12 months, to build all the housing units which might be processed. And, in addition, there are 115,000 public housing units which at the moment are being constructed or are under contract. Of course, people have not yet moved into them. Think of that, Mr. President; 115,000 not yet available, but contracted for or about finished.

So here is an opportunity for us to save $21 million toward balancing the budget in 1960. This amendment, if adopted, will not interfere at all with the program. Senators can vote for this amendment with a clear conscience and with assurance that it will not hold back public housing, but that it will save $21 million in 1960.

As I have stated, 115,000 units are in process at the moment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I think each Member of the Senate should know that if he votes for this amendment, he will vote to kill urban renewal and urban redevelopment by slow strangulation.

The urban renewal law requires that before a slum can be cleared, provision must be made to relocate in safe and sanitary housing the families who have been living in the slum. The income level of a majority of the slum dwellers is so low that it is impossible for them to acquire safe and sanitary housing through private sources. Therefore, it is incumbent upon us to provide for the great need for such housing, not only by urban renewal, but through other governmental action.

Senators who vote in favor of the Capehart amendment will vote to render homeless the people who will have to move out of the slums and out of the highway rights-of-way in the next 3 or 4 years.

I sincerely hope the amendment will be rejected. Certainly it should be rejected.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FREAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I think it should be pointed out that the bill deals with a subject which I believe to be extremely helpful from the point of view of the development of communities on urban-renewal sites. I shall not trouble the Senate at this time with the details; but the bill encourages, for the first time, the establishment of public-housing projects upon the urban-renewal sites themselves.

In view of the fact that most urban-renewal developments will include some commercial establishments and, in many cases, cooperative apartments or apartments otherwise held at higher prices than those charged for public housing, I think the new provision of the bill gives us some assurance of balanced communities; and also I believe it buttresses the point of public housing as part of the essential development of urban renewal and the utilization of important metropolitan facilities continuously, rather than to abandon them because people no longer live there.

So, in view of the very modest amount of public housing which now is provided for—and which those of us who, like myself, who have fought this battle for 16 years now, recognize to be very modest and very limited, because it is for the relocation of families for which such housing is most urgently needed—I hope this modicum will not be cast out of the bill. I believe it is essential to a modest housing program and housing act. So I hope very much that this provision will be retained in the bill.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am happy to yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania. I did not realize that he still had the floor.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement from the Public Housing Administration concerning public low-rent housing units both as of January 1, 1959, and as of June 30, 1960, as estimated. These are simply the figures the PHA has submitted.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOW-RENT PUBLIC HOUSING UNITS

(A) As of January 1, 1959, we have units:
(1) Under management	444,173
(2) Under construction	30,007
(3) Under contract, but not yet started	81,769
(4) Authorized, but not yet under contract	30,589
Total	586,538
(B) As of June 30, 1960, we expect to have:
(1) Completed	475,000
(2) Under construction or under Federal-aid contract	110,000
Approximate total	585,000

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I believe it is important to note that the total inventory of public housing today is less than 1 percent of the total habitable housing units in the Nation. The testimony given before our committee indicates that in order to meet the need for public housing in the next 2 years, an additional 250,000 units will be required.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, before the Senate votes on the pending proposal, I hope the record will be quite clear as to what the Senate will be doing and as to the authorization amounts involved.

As I understand—and if I am in error, I ask any member of the committee to correct me—there is involved in the pending Sparkman bill a carryover of authority on housing units, plus new authorization, which over a 2-year period will make available 25,500 units annually. That will be a total of 51,000 public housing units over the 2-year period.

If I am correctly informed, these units cost $13,600 apiece, according to the Housing Authority. Without going into the details of the arithmetic, let me say that I have an idea that we are dealing with a commitment, over a 40-year period, of $900 million. Either I am right or I am wrong. If I am wrong, let some Senator stand up and tell me I am wrong, and I will back off. If I am right, the record will bear me out.

Mr. President, I was at the other end of the Capitol when the program started, long ago. This was a part of the program for one-third of the ill-housed. The limits of income are now so high that pretty nearly everybody can get into one of the housing units.

It is all right to talk about urban renewal and slum clearance, but a peak number of houses are being built in all sections of the country, and are available to all the people. If the Senate wants to commit the Government for this amount of money, all right; but let us be sure we know we are making that commitment.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The distinguished minority leader is right. The amount involved here is between 8 and 9 hundred million dollars. We know there is authority to build 100,000 units, which have been committed, except for about 10,000. But that will be under the provision Congress has already authorized. The provision in the pending bill will cost, as the Senator has said, something over $900 million—nearly $1 billion. For that reason the junior Senator from Virginia is going to vote to reduce the amount.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is a commitment which will apply over 40 years and will add to the debt limit. I am not going down that road. I think public housing has gotten on the wrong track. It started out all right, but I think it has hit a couple of detours.

Before I vote to authorize any more units, I want to be pretty sure I am on solid ground. This program needs a great deal more looking at than it has received so far.

I commend the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART].

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I believe the amendment proposes to strike out section 405 of the bill. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I find in the copy of the bill I have, which has on it the identification "Report No. 41," there are two sections 405. I wonder which one the amendment refers to. There is one such section on page 23, and another one on page 131.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana relates to the additional low rent housing units.

Mr. CAPEHART. Public housing units.

Mr. McCLELLAN. It is the section referred to on page 123. Is that correct?

Mr. CAPEHART. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to strike out section 405, relating to additional public housing units. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE] would each vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

If present and voting, the Senator from Oregon would vote "nay" and the Senator from North Dakota would vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] are detained on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL] is absent because of illness.

On this vote, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER].

If present and voting, the Senator from North Dakota would vote "yea" and the Senator from Oregon would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 50, not voting 11, as follows:

So Mr. CAPEHART'S amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I offer an amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 704(d), relating to VA direct loans.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been requested. Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Now that the yeas and nays have been ordered on the Senator's amendment, will the Senator indicate how long he anticipates discussing his amendment?

Mr. CAPEHART. I will discuss the amendment only for 1 minute or so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, we will have the yeas and nays on this amendment. I assume the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] will not require much time. As soon as we conclude the next vote we will have no further votes this evening.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I am personally willing to quit, or we can vote on this; whatever the management wishes. [Laughter.]

I do not know of a better way to describe it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Now that we are in agreement, will the Senator proceed to discuss the merits of his amendment?

Mr. CAPEHART. I think what I said was a perfect way to describe the able majority leader and the able minority leader. They are really the managers.

This amendment would eliminate $300 million of direct loans to veterans, on the theory, based on the best information we can secure, that as a result of raising the interest rate to 5¼ percent on VA loans private industry will be happy and glad to buy every VA mortgage which will be made available. We can therefore save $200 million, as estimated by the FHA, which otherwise will be a drain on the Treasury in 1960.

If Senators will vote for the amendment they can save $200 million, according to the FHA, and stop a drain on the Treasury in 1960.

If the amendment is agreed to, the only difference between the so-called administration bill and the bill we are considering will be about $35 million.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. In my opinion—and it is the opinion of those better qualified than I—we do not need to provide this money. We do not need to make direct loans to veterans, if we increase the interest rate, as the House of Representatives has done and as the bill would do.

Furthermore, if we eliminate this item, we will then have a difference of only $35 million between the administration bill and the Sparkman bill. It seems to me if we are conscientious and sincere about wanting to balance the budget—and I know we are—this is the best way to do it.

At the moment the difference between the Senate bill which we are considering and the administration proposal is approximately $240 million, of which $200 million is represented by this one item. It seems to me to be good, common horse sense and good judgment——

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What is the present rate of interest allowed to be charged in order to qualify for a guaranteed loan?

Mr. CAPEHART. The present rate of interest on direct loans is 4¾ percent. For many years it was 4¼ percent. We increased it last year by one-half of 1 percent, and we got a couple of hundred thousand VA houses. Now it is proposed to increase it to 5¼. Private investors will pick those mortgages up, because a VA mortgage is more attractive than an FHA mortgage, because if an FHA mortgage goes into default, the FHA issues a debenture. If a veteran's loan is defaulted, the Veterans' Administration gives cash or a check. Therefore, when the interest rates are the same, investors will want VA mortgages rather than FHA mortgages.

This would be a good place to stop much of the argument. It seems to me that if this proposal were adopted the administration bill and Senate bill 57 would be only about $35 million apart.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. What evidence did the committee have that veterans' houses would be built if the interest rate were changed?

Mr. CAPEHART. I do not believe there is any argument on the question whether or not they would be built. Those who argue for this proposal maintain that it is needed for the remote rural districts. My position, and the position of those who are better qualified than I am, is that if we increase the interest rate, investors everywhere will pick up veterans' mortgages. What could be better than a veteran's mortgage guaranteed 100 percent by the United States Government, and bearing 5¼ percent interest?

The House has already retained the $300 million in a bill. So I suggest that we eliminate the $300 million and go to conference, because in that event the question would be thrown into conference. The House will have something to say on that subject, but we would be much better off, as conferees, if we could go to the House with an amount which puts the question in conference. Really, the $300 million is not needed. It would throw the budget out of balance by an estimated $200 million. It would promote a great deal of propaganda, and would encourage people over the country to say that Congress voted the budget out of balance when there was no need for it.

If I thought for a moment that this proposal would deny a single veteran a mortgage, I would not be advocating it. But I honestly believe, in my own mind, that it would not deny a single veteran a single loan.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Am I correct in my understanding that under the existing law, even if the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana were adopted, every veteran would be eligible for the benefits of guaranteed loans made by the Federal Government, on mortgages bearing interest at the rate of 5¼ percent?

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator is correct.

Moreover, the law provides that a veteran cannot obtain a direct loan from the Government if he can obtain a loan anywhere else. He cannot participate in any part of the $300 million if he can obtain a loan anywhere else at a comparable rate. So if we have a 5¼-percent mortgage, we know that the veteran is going to be able to obtain the loan, because private investors will be interested.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. The Senator will agree, will he not, that the 5¼-percent rate is a ceiling? It might very well be that mortgages could be obtained at a lesser rate, under this legislation.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator is 100 percent correct.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. I was interested in what the distinguished ranking Republican member of the committee said about the 5¼ percent interest rate. I should like to announce, for the information of the Senate, that I have an amendment, sponsored by myself, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH], the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON], the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], and the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], to freeze the interest rate at 4¾ percent. That was the amount approved by the Senate last year, when we were told that all that was needed to release a flood of GI private money was to increase the rate to 4¾ percent. We increased it. Now, after 10 months, we are faced with a proposal to increase it further by ½ of 1 percent. When we yield to the greed of the money lenders who go on a sit-down strike, we are in the position where we shall be invading outer space with our interest rates sooner than with our missiles.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CAPEHART. The best answer to that argument—perhaps not conclusive—is that the House has already increased the interest rate to 5¼ percent. Members of the House must have some idea what they are doing. There are more of them—at least more of them to make mistakes, if they make a mistake. [Laughter.]

The thing in which we are all interested is seeing that the GI gets a home. If it is necessary to increase the interest rate in order to do it, let us do it. I am a veteran. I should like to have anyone give me one good reason why, after 11 or 12 years following the end of the Korean war, a veteran should have an advantage in interest rates over a working man who is working for $1.50 or $2 an hour, particularly if, by doing what is proposed, we can help to keep the budget in balance. That is the important thing, in my judgment.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to the Chair?

Mr. CAPEHART. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asks the Senator from Indiana if he yielded to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] for the purpose of making the unanimous-consent request which he propounded.

Mr. CAPEHART. I have no objection to allowing the Senator from Oklahoma to submit his amendment and have it printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. CAPEHART. I now yield to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN].

Mr. McCLELLAN. If the committee proposal prevails, and the Senator's amendment is rejected, I should like to inquire what the interest rates would be on direct loans to veterans.

Mr. CAPEHART. Will the Senator restate the question?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Under the provisions of the committee proposal, what would be the interest rate on direct loans to veterans from the Government?

Mr. CAPEHART. Five and one-quarter percent.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Am I to understand that the Senator from Oklahoma proposes——

Mr. CAPEHART. But if it is rejected, the rate will remain at 4¾ percent.

Mr. McCLELLAN. If what is rejected?

Mr. CAPEHART. The amendment——

Mr. McCLELLAN. If the Senator's amendment is rejected?

Mr. CAPEHART. No. My amendment deals only with the $300 million. The bill, Senate bill 57, which we are trying to amend, in another section increases the interest rate from 4¾ to 5¼. In other words, the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, in Senate bill 57, the so-called Sparkman bill, voted unanimously to increase the interest rate to 5¼ percent. If my amendment is adopted, the situation will be that we shall have an interest rate of 5¼ percent. There is still some money with which to make direct loans to veterans.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Assuming that we are to allow the veteran to obtain a direct loan from the Government, how much interest will he have to pay on such loan?

Mr. CAPEHART. Five and one-quarter percent, under the terms of the committee proposal.

Mr. McCLELLAN. What is the difference between obtaining a loan directly from the bank and paying 5¼ percent interest, and obtaining a loan directly from the Government and paying 5¼ percent interest?

Mr. CAPEHART. There is no difference so far as interest is concerned.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I understand that he may possibly obtain a loan from the bank at a lower rate. Is it proposed to freeze the interest rate at 5¼ percent?

Mr. CAPEHART. Five and one-quarter percent is the maximum that could be charged. A bank could lend money at a lesser rate if it so desired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Suppose the veteran elects to go to the Government and obtain the loan direct, as authorized by the bill.

Mr. CAPEHART. He cannot obtain the loan directly from the Government, if a banker is willing to lend him the money at 5¼ percent.

Mr. McCLELLAN. In other words, if a bank will not make the loan at 5¼ percent——

Mr. CAPEHART. He cannot come to the Government.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The borrower cannot come to the Government. However, if he does come to the Government, he will have to pay 5¼ percent. Is that correct?

Mr. CAPEHART. That is correct. All we are trying to do is help balance the budget and make it possible for veterans to secure houses and to give them no advantage over the 30 million or 40 million people who are laboring people. The veterans are laboring people too. They are interested in balancing the budget also. They are good citizens. I do not believe they want any advantage. This particular amount will not help them.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I want it made clear that there is nothing mandatory about the 5¼ percent. The interest does not have to go up that high.

Mr. CAPEHART. That is correct. It does not have to go up that high.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is the limit.

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes. In the housing bills we have always set a limit. It is possible to charge less, of course. In 90 percent of the times the amount has been less.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The Federal Government could charge less than 5¼ percent?

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The 5¼ percent is the maximum. Is that correct?

Mr. CAPEHART. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I cannot understand that point. Would the Administrator be authorized to discriminate by charging one veteran 5 percent, another 5¼ percent, and still another 4¾ percent? Could the Administrator do that?

Mr. CAPEHART. No; but the banks could do it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The banks could do it. I am talking about the Government.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Administrator could not do it. The bank could not do it and get the Government's guarantee. It cannot be done without the Government's guarantee.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Is it not true that at the present time the rate is 4¾ percent, and is it not also true that the banks discount the amount to about 94½? I am speaking of most banks.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator has brought up a good point. The banks that buy the mortgages discount them to 96 or 94, and that gives them the same rate of yield as FHA mortgages, which carry 5¼ percent.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I should like to know what assurance there is that the mortgages will not be discounted in the future.

Mr. CAPEHART. I do not know that I could give the Senator any assurance.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to say that I am not particularly impressed by the argument that if we raise the interest rate someone will make a loan sooner or later. I should like to say this, however, that in this country we have hundreds of thousands of small farms which have become uneconomic for farming purposes but which are ideal for residential purposes. They may be located anywhere from 10 to 15 miles out of town. I should like to make it as practicable as possible for veterans and their families to utilize these small farms as homes, as many of them have already done in New England and the eastern parts of the country.

I also wish to point out that, using my State as an example of a rural State, the average loan has been $6,000, while the average loan throughout the country, urban and rural combined, has been about $10,000.

It is evident that for a million dollars it is possible to house more people in rural areas than in the more expensive city areas. Furthermore, I venture the prediction that if the ceiling on the interest is fixed at 5¼ percent it will not necessarily mean that the veterans or anyone else will get 5¼ percent money. The rate would probably go up. I know from talking to some of my friends that it probably would. I am pretty sure it would be 6 percent plus a service charge. If there is a provision in the bill for direct loans, perhaps local banks will make 5¼ percent bank loans under FHA. If there is no provision, I would not give much for any chances of the fellow who lives 8 or 10 miles out of town of getting a loan.

I cannot vote for the amendment because I do not believe it would result in something I want to see, namely, more people getting out of the crowded areas in towns and cities and moving into rural districts.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator is mistaken. The rate could not possibly be more than 5¼ percent and be guaranteed by the Government.

Mr. AIKEN. But I know people who would rather have 6 percent without the Government guarantee. I wish to make it as practicable as I can for as many people as possible to get out of town and into the rural areas. It is better for them and better for the country. It may cost a little bit more to build highways and schools for them, but it fits in with our rural development program.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator is proceeding on the theory that a great many veterans live in the country. It is a very small proportion.

Mr. AIKEN. I live 4 miles out of town, and I am surrounded by veterans.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. The argument is made that, so far as direct loans to veterans are concerned, particularly to veterans who live in small communities and in rural areas, this credit will not be available. From the discussions in committee, and from the Senator's information, can he give us any assurance as to where credit would be available to veterans in small towns?

Mr. CAPEHART. If we make the interest rate the same on veterans' loans as on FHA loans and on other loans, the veteran loan, being a more attractive loan to the investor, the investor will buy the attractive loan at the same interest rate, before he does the other loan. Therefore, we feel it safe to assume that the investor will buy the veteran's loan because of the increase in the interest rate, and because the Federal Government guarantees the loan 100 percent. The one who buys the loan does not care about the location, as the Senator from Vermont has observed. It is guaranteed by the Federal Government, and it carries 5¼ percent interest, and if it is defaulted, the investor gets his cash.

Mr. COOPER. But the private institution takes into account the financial responsibility of the borrower. Most of those borrowers are young people starting out in life. The real problem in many small rural sections, as I see it, is whether the banks will make available this credit. Does the Senator have any answer to that problem?

Mr. CAPEHART. I do not know whether anyone can answer it completely, except that the investors have been buying the mortgages.

Mr. COOPER. Does the Senator remember how much was made available in the Housing Act of 1958 for direct veterans' loans?

Mr. CAPEHART. I cannot be accurate about it, but I think it was in the neighborhood of $100 million, in 1958.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is approximately correct.

Mr. CAPEHART. Now we are talking about $300 million, with an increase in the interest rate.

Mr. COOPER. The information that has come to me from letters from people in my own State is that in many small communities they cannot get money from private institutions. Would the Senator consider amending his amendment to assure us that some money would be available for direct loans?

Mr. CAPEHART. I would suggest that we vote on the pending amendment. If it fails—and I am sure it will not fail—the Senator can offer an amendment. Perhaps the Senator would like to offer an amendment to my amendment. That is the privilege of every Senator.

Mr. COOPER. I ask unanimous consent that I may offer an amendment to the Senator's amendment, that is, to reduce the $300 million to $150 million.

Mr. LANGER. I object.

Mr. CAPEHART. I would suggest that we first vote on my amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I shall speak very briefly on the amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky will state it.

Mr. COOPER. I offered a modifying amendment. I understood the yeas and nays had been ordered on the Capehart amendment. I was under the impression that I had to ask unanimous consent in order to offer my modifying amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection was offered.

Mr. COOPER. Was it necessary for me to secure unanimous consent to offer my modifying amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment is now pending.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky will state it.

Mr. COOPER. A few minutes ago I offered an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. My proposal was to reduce the amount from $300 million to $150 million. I ask if unanimous consent was required to offer my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was in error in his ruling. The Senator from Kentucky offered an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. It was the understanding of the Chair that objection had been raised. But the objection was raised in error. The Senator from Kentucky can offer his amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. COOPER. I offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana, the Chair understood, yielded to the Senator from Kentucky for that purpose.

Mr. CAPEHART. Unless there is great objection, I am prepared to accept the amount of $150 million.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is certain that the Senator from Indiana is well familiar with the procedure when the yeas and nays have already been ordered.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so as to strike out "$300 million" and insert in lieu thereof "$150 million."

Mr. LANGER. I object.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the order for the yea and nay vote on my amendment and to permit a vote by acclamation. Then I shall offer the amendment for $150 million.

Mr. LANGER. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I wish to make certain that I still have the floor. I was under the impression that I had been recognized, and I had started to speak. I did not yield to any Senator. I do not know how all this discussion got started.

I hope that some arrangement can be worked out. As I understand the situation, it is this. The Senator from Indiana offered an amendment to strike out altogether the provision which made veterans who live in rural or semirural areas eligible for loans with which to build decent houses at a maximum cost of $10,000 each. I think that picture should be made clear.

Then the Senator from Kentucky, as I understand, indicated a desire to continue the program, but to reduce the amount from $300 million to $150 million. I stated earlier in the day that I was not at all certain that $300 million was really necessary if the interest rate were raised to 5¼ percent, as is provided in another section of the bill.

I do not agree with the Senator from Indiana and other Senators who have stated that the moneylenders would rush in to every nook and corner of the Nation, to the rural areas of southwest Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi, Virginia, Vermont, and all the other States—including Texas. [Laughter.] I could name every State in the Union, because there are rural and semirural sections in every State in which it is not possible for a veteran to get mortgage money with which to build a decent $10,000 home in which to rear his children.

That is what the program is designed for. The law states that such a program shall be accorded the credit-worthy veterans who live in rural or semirural areas and who are unable to obtain financial help elsewhere. Under the present program, every possible way is provided to make such help available to veterans, but only in the event it is not available from other sources.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Is it not true that for the last 2 or 3 years farmers have been unable to get loans at 4½ percent from any bank or insurance company?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is true.

Mr. LANGER. Farmer after farmer was foreclosed. Now it is proposed to make the amount available $150 million. In my opinion, that amount will not go far enough. I think we ought to hold to the entire $300 million. That is why I have objected.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let me remind the Senator from North Dakota of one thing which might be overlooked. The program is already set up with a revolving fund. The general law provides that $150 million a year shall be added to the revolving fund. I do not want Senators to lose sight of that fact. So $150 million will automatically be added to the revolving fund. The Senator from Kentucky proposes to add $150 million to that amount.

I may say to the Senator from Kentucky, the Senator from North Dakota, and the Senator from Indiana, who offered the main amendment, that I am of the opinion that a good job can be done with the $150 million which will be additional to the $150 million which will go into the regular rotating or revolving fund.

I hope the Senator from North Dakota will not object, but will let the amendment be offered. Remember, the question will be in conference between the House and Senate. The House has passed a bill which provides $300 million. If we pass a bill which will provide for $150 million, the amount which will be agreed to in conference should be somewhere between those two figures.

Mr. LANGER. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. COOPER. I offer my modifying amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 153, line 9, it is proposed to strike out "$300,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$150,000,000."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I join with the Senator from Kentucky as a cosponsor of the amendment.

Mr. CAPEHART. I am very happy to modify my amendment and to accept the figure of $150 million.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the order for the yea-and-nay vote, to modify my amendment, and to accept the figure of $150 million in lieu of $300 million.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Senator from Indiana now accepts the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, on page 153, line 9, to strike out "$300,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$150,000,000."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I have not seen so much confusion in this Chamber in a long time on what is, in my judgment, one of the most challenging issues before the Senate.

When we went down the road of direct loans to be made out of the Federal Treasury to veterans in remote and inaccessible places, as the law provides, I said at the time that we would never come back on that road. What has happened today proves it. Every request to go farther down that road proves it. Wait until we rack up billions of dollars of direct loans out of the Treasury. We will not stop with veterans. Let us not kid ourselves on that score.

There was a reason for our action the first time. There was some justification for it. The Housing and Home Finance Agency and the Veterans' Administration were not tooled up to do the paperwork in inaccessible areas in order to make loans to veterans. That was a good index. I think they made a pretty good case. But something has happened since that time. They tried out, in 30 different areas, a method by which little banks, trusted fiduciaries, trusted representatives, small building and loan associations, became the agents of the Housing Agency to do the paperwork necessary to make the loans. That technique is now being extended to every section of the country.

The reason given heretofore for lending directly out of the Treasury for this purpose has fallen; it has been cast aside; and no longer is there any justification for it. The Housing Administration will tell Senators there is no justification for it. The Housing Administration will tell Senators that it can now process these loans, because it tried that, and it was a demonstrated success in over 30 areas of the country.

Where, then, is the justification for tapping the Federal till for $150 million or $300 million? We got $150 million before. So now it is proposed to add $150 million to it.

There is another legislative body which wanted to increase the ante. We shall hear about $500 million, and we shall hear about $1 billion. But where are we going to shut it off?

What shall we say to the little tenant farmers who want to reach into the Treasury on the same basis? We shall not have an answer.

Eighteen months ago I said to the President, "Mr. President, I hope you will not go down that road, because if you do, you never will walk back."

And today there is living proof in this Senate Chamber that we are walking farther and farther down that road.

Mr. President, what do you think the next Congress will do? Senators will rue the day they do it, if they do it now.

Before Senators cast an emotional vote, they should be sure where it will take us.

Mr. President, I will not accept any compromise. Any amount of this sort will still breach the budget. Even the $150 million will breach the President's budget by $36 million. And I will be the last to punch a hole in the dike.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I had asked the Senator to yield, and I understand that he did yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana was recognized; and he has asked to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wish to inquire about the parliamentary situation. The Senator from Indiana is requesting unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment, which would strike from the bill the $300 million authorization. That was the amount in the original amendment, as I understand. Is that correct?

Mr. CAPEHART. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I understand that today the other body passed the measure with the $300 million authorization included in it. I understand that our committee voted to recommend to the Senate the $300 million authorization. In an effort to come as close as possible to the recommendations of the administration, I asked the members of the committee on both sides to consider amending the bill by reducing the authorization from $300 million to $150 million, because no one can have his way all the time on every item. I believe that we shall be more likely to obtain some veterans' housing if we provide for $150 million, rather than $300 million.

I did not know the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] was working on the same matter; but I had had several conversations with the chairman of the subcommittee and with other members of the subcommittee. I had also talked to some of the officials of the House of Representatives, in the hope that if the Senate voted the $150 million authorization, we could go to conference, and there could try to obtain an amount which would be acceptable to the legislative branch of the Government, and one which perhaps would be acceptable to the administration. If we can do that with reasonable unanimity, I think we should try to do so.

If there are going to be deep divisions and if a substantial number of Members are opposed to the $150 million, then I believe we should proceed to vote on the original Capehart amendment.

I had thought we had an agreement. I did not hear the statement made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]; I was out of the Chamber at the time. But I should like to ask him whether I correctly understand that he is opposed to the $150 million authorization.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I was just speaking my conviction, and I think I was asserting the position of the administration, because the housing bill which came to us did not call for any amounts, outside of the funds carried over, for direct funds to veterans. If I am wrong, I ask to be corrected.

However, I think that is the form in which the bill came to us. Certainly, under the circumstances, and in view of the background involved, and in view of my conviction that at the end of this road there will be difficulty for us, I had to assert that viewpoint.

What the majority here may do is quite another matter; and certainly I shall not stand in the way. But I believe the viewpoint which was expressed by the Housing and Home Finance Agency and by the President of the United States should be accurately and authoritatively asserted on this floor; and that I have done.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from South Dakota first to permit me to yield to the Senator from Alabama; and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Then, Mr. President, at this time I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I believe the RECORD should show what the law on this point is. The Senator from Illinois referred to the remote sections. Here is the law, and this is the form in which it was originally passed in 1950:

(b) Whenever the Administrator finds that private capital is not generally available in any rural area or small city or town for the financing of loans guaranteed under section 501 of this title, he shall designate such rural area or small city or town as a "housing credit shortage area" and shall make, or enter into commitments to make, loans for any or all of the following purposes in such area:

(1) For the purchase or construction of a dwelling to be owned and occupied by a veteran as his home;

(2) For the purchase of a farm on which there is a farm residence to be owned and occupied by a veteran as his home;

(3) For the construction on land owned by a veteran of a farm residence to be occupied by him as his home; or

(4) For the repair, alteration, or improvement of a farm residence or other dwelling owned by a veteran and occupied by him as his home.

If there is an indebtedness which is secured by a lien against land owned by a veteran, the proceeds of a loan made under this section for the construction of a dwelling or farm residence on such land may be expended also to liquidate such lien, but only if the reasonable value of the land is equal to or in excess of the amount of the lien.

(c) No loan may be made under this section to a veteran unless he shows to the satisfaction of the Administrator that—

(1) He is a satisfactory credit risk;

(2) The payments to be required under the proposed loan bear a proper relation to his present and anticipated income and expenses;

(3) He is unable to obtain from a private lender in such housing credit shortage area, at an interest rate not in excess of the rate authorized for guaranteed home loans, a loan for such purpose for which he is qualified under section 501 of this title; and

(4) He is unable to obtain a loan for such purpose from the Secretary of Agriculture under the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act or under the Housing Act of 1949.

In other words, Mr. President, I want the RECORD to show that the law is limited to those rural and semirural areas.

I wish to remind the distinguished Senator from Illinois that when this question came up for extension—I believe it was in 1952 or 1953, but I do not remember just when the Senator from Illinois came to the Senate, and perhaps he will enlighten me on that point; but it was the first extension after that time—the Senate incorporated the revolving-fund provision with the annual contribution method provision; and I remember quite well that the Senator from Illinois took the floor and had some good words to say about the program and about this revolving feature. He was most helpful in getting that extension through in the form in which it has operated.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, just let the Senator from Alabama document the RECORD, instead of guessing.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I shall be glad to do so. I stated that it was when the extension came up. As I recall, it was 1952 or 1953; and the Senator from Illinois made a speech about it, and complimented us for bringing in the revolving-fund feature with this annual contribution to it; and the program has continued to operate in that way, down to this very day.

Today, all we are doing is trying to put some supplemental funds into that revolving fund, in order to take care of the backlog which has accumulated; and the Veterans' Administration tells us that as of December 31, it had 50,000 applications in its backlog.

The program is a remarkably good one. As I pointed out earlier today, 6 percent of the mortgages have been paid off in full; 6 percent have been sold to private investors; and less than one-half of 1 percent have been foreclosed. The program has been remarkably successful, and I certainly think it is one program which we ought to help move forward. It is not in competition with private capital. It works only in areas where private capital is not available.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: A moment ago I rose to a point of order, and I understood the Senator from Texas to agree that I would be recognized for that purpose, following the remarks of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes; I did make that commitment. So if the Senator from Tennessee will please wait, inasmuch as I had that commitment to the Senator from South Dakota, I now yield to him.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I thank the Senator from Texas.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that the order for the yeas and nays on the Capehart amendment had been withdrawn. In that case, the Senator from Indiana had a right to withdraw his amendment as a matter of right, and did not have to request unanimous consent. In that event, the only amendment now before the Senate is that of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand that is the case. I was temporarily detained, and it was my understanding that no unanimous consent had been given to withdraw the yeas and nays. If I was in error—and the minority leader indicates that I was, and he is usually very accurate; and I was not in the Chamber at that moment—then the present parliamentary situation, as I now understand it, is that the question at this time before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER]. The Senator from Kentucky offered an amendment which I have been trying all afternoon to get accepted by both sides; and I thought I had just about gotten it accepted, when I left the Chamber. Then my delightful friend, the Senator from Illinois, made a speech against the amendment.

I do not want the yeas and nays on the Cooper amendment, if it is agreeable to the author. I think we can vote the amendment in and recess for the evening.

Mr. COOPER. I have not asked for the yeas and nays. I am perfectly willing to have a voice vote.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. The able junior Senator from Alabama said that all this provision did was provide additional money. I respectfully suggest it does one other thing. It increases the interest rate by which the money already available can be loaned to veterans as well as the rate at which the additional money herein proposed can be loaned.

I would regret to see the first bill passed by this new Congress increase the interest rates for veterans' loans higher than those for other loans which the Government makes. For example, the loans under the REA program are at 2 percent; for veterans they would be 5¼ percent under this bill. Farmers home loans are made at 4 percent, and loans to aid in ship construction are made at 3½ percent; for veterans they would be at 5¼ percent under this bill.

During the last 5 months the interest rates on Government bonds, Government bills, and prime commercial paper have experienced the most drastic increase that has taken place in any similar period in history. It is time this Congress wrote a democratic housing bill.

I will join the able junior Senator from Oklahoma and other Senators in the amendment which he proposes to offer, and in other amendments which will be offered, in an attempt to do so.

For 14 years, including the first 2 years of the Eisenhower administration, the Federal National Mortgage Association served as a secondary market for home loan mortgages. It did so at a profit for the Government. I repeat, for 14 years, under the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt, former President Harry Truman, and President Dwight D. Eisenhower, that happened.

What is wrong with a program that has been tested and proved and found successful and profitable for 14 years? The tight money policy and an acceleration of the inflationary spiral of interest rates is not the answer.

To supplement the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Oklahoma, for himself and other Senators, I shall offer an amendment which will restore the program I have described, under which the Federal National Mortgage Association will provide an effective secondary market for home mortgages.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In my opinion, the Senator from Tennessee is correct that this bill increases the interest rate, and I believe most Members of the Senate are aware of that fact. I think before we conclude consideration of the pending bill we shall have an opportunity to pass on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from Tennessee.

Now I want to dispose of the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, if I can.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BUSH. If the Senate votes for the Cooper amendment and agrees to it, it would still be in order for the original Capehart amendment to be called up, if the Senator from Indiana does it, or if any other Senator does it. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, the statement of the Senator from Connecticut is accurate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, may we have a vote on the Cooper amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the Cooper amendment was adopted.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourns this evening, it stand in adjournment until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in adjournment until 11 o'clock a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 16 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Thursday, February 5, 1959, at 11 o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend Arthur E. Paterson, of Middletown, Conn., offered the following prayer:

O God eternal and infinite, who in the midst of all things transitory art ever the same our Heavenly Father; do Thou, we pray, for this day, at this its beginning, throughout its hours and at its ending, be the guide of our thinking, our words, and our action.

We ask Thy blessing upon the President of the United States, its Congress and its courts, and upon men of good will throughout this Nation.

When this day questions arise enlisting our concern, give us grace at every point first to listen inwardly for Thine answer and for Thy direction; that on this floor, in committee room, or elsewhere, we may ever be stalwart in safeguarding and confirming the principles of right, justice, and charity toward all men in all parts of this beloved land.

This we ask through Jesus Christ our Lord, whose leadership we desire with longing hearts in a perplexed and ever-changing world. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THORNBERRY].

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up a privileged resolution (H. Res. 147) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor, effective from January 3, 1959, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized to conduct a full and complete study and investigation relating to all matters coming within the jurisdiction of the committee: Provided, That the committee shall not undertake any investigation of any subject which is being investigated by any other committee of the House.

For the purposes of such investigations and studies the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, whether the House has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, and to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents, as it deems necessary. Subpenas shall be issued only over the signature of the chairman of the committee or a member of the committee designated by him; they may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses.

The committee may report to the House of Representatives from time to time during the present Congress the results of its studies and investigations, with such recommendations for legislation or otherwise as the committee deems desirable. Any report submitted when the House is not in session shall be filed with the Clerk of the House.

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, as the reading of the resolution indicates, this is the usual resolution giving to the Committee on Education and Labor authority to conduct investigations within its jurisdiction. I have no requests for time.

I yield to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. BUDGE].

Mr. BUDGE. Mr. Speaker, I know of no objection to the adoption of the resolution. I have no requests for time.

The resolution was agreed to and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up a privileged resolution (H. Res. 51) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, effective January 4, 1959, there is hereby created a select committee to be composed of fifteen Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker, one of whom he shall designate as chairman. Any vacancy occurring in the membership of the committee shall be filled in the manner in which the original appointment was made.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of such committee to conduct studies and investigations of the problems of all types of small business, existing, arising, or that may arise, with particular reference to (1) the factors which have impeded or may impede the normal operations, growth, and development of the potentialities thereof; (2) the administration of Federal laws relating specifically to small business to determine whether such laws and their administration adequately serve the needs of small business; (3) whether Government agencies adequately serve and give due consideration to the problems of small business; and (4) to study and investigate problems of small business enterprises generally, and to obtain all facts possible in relation thereto which would not only be of public interest but which would aid the Congress in enacting remedial legislation: Provided, That the committee shall not invade any subject matter under active investigation by any standing committee of the House.

SEC. 3. The committee may from time to time submit to the House such preliminary reports as it deems advisable; and prior to the close of the present Congress shall submit to the House its final report on the results of its study and investigation, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable. Any report submitted when the House is not in session may be filed with the Clerk of the House.

SEC. 4. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, whether or not the House has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, and to take such testimony, as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or any properly designated chairman of a subcommittee, or any member designated by him, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses.

Sec. 5. The majority of the members of the committee shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, except two or more shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of taking of evidence including sworn testimony.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "Speaker," insert "seven from the majority party and six from the minority party."

Page 1, line 8, strike out "It shall be the duty of such committee" and insert "The select committee is authorized."

Page 2, line 10, change the colon to a period.

Page 2, line 10 through line 13, strike the following: "Provided, That the committee shall not invade any subject matter under active investigation by any standing committee of the House," and insert the following: "Provided, That the committee shall not undertake any investigation of any subject which is being investigated by any other committee of the House."

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, as a reading of the resolution and the committee amendments indicate, this is the usual resolution creating a Select Committee on Small Business.

The resolution called for a membership of 15 Members to be appointed by the Speaker; but the committee has offered an amendment to the resolution which will authorize the Speaker to appoint 13 Members, 7 of the majority party and 6 of the minority party.

This is a committee of the House that has done an important job for the small businessmen of the Nation.

I know of no objection to the resolution on this side of the aisle.

Mr. BUDGE. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was adopted unanimously. I know of no objection and I have no requests for time on this side.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A UNIVERSITY OF THE AMERICAS

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced a joint resolution to provide for a study of the possibility and desirability of establishing a university of the Americas. This bill is identical with House Joint Resolution 1, introduced by the Honorable HALE BOGGS, of Louisiana, whose leadership and judgment in matters affecting the Western Hemisphere is recognized and appreciated by all who study the relations of our own country with our friends and neighbors of Central and South America.

It is my opinion that we have long neglected the friendship of our Western Hemisphere brothers, to favor others whose friendship in many instances has been, to say the least, questionable. Many of our Latin American friends have expressed such an opinion.

This legislation would go far in promoting our mutual interests, and facilitating understanding beyond that which presently exists. It would supplement, if enacted, the Pan American Union and other efforts toward joint and mutual contribution toward a better tomorrow.

The cost is negligible compared to the prospective benefits. A study would yield much information of value.

Our new world is a world of new culture, happy culture, so well expressed in the music and song, as well as the poetry, of our friends and neighbors to the south. I do not believe they know that most of us appreciate them as much as we do.

I strongly urge the passage of this legislation.

DEBBIE QUINN, LA PORTE, IND., AMERICA'S VALENTINE GIRL FOR 1959

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, it is a great honor for me to call the attention of my colleagues in the House to a young and lovely little girl now watching these proceedings from the gallery.

She is 6-year-old Debbie Quinn, of La Porte, Ind., a city in the district I represent. As you see Debbie now, she is the picture of health and energy. Yet Debbie was born with four serious heart defects, including a hole the size of a quarter between the heart ventricles.

But thanks to the dedication and skill of Dr. C. Walton Lillehei of the University of Minnesota Heart Hospital, her heart was repaired and as Debbie says "It's as good as new." The operation Dr. Lillehei performed took 7½ hours. During that time the functions of Debbie's heart and lungs were taken over by a newly developed machine, to leave the heart free for the surgeon's work.

Debbie, with her parents and brother, Bobby, is visiting us today as America's Valentine Girl for 1959, an honor which was bestowed upon her yesterday at the White House by Mrs. Eisenhower. She has been chosen as a symbol of hope for heart victims everywhere by the American Heart Association.

The fact that Debbie, whose heart defects would have been incurable 10 years ago, is here with us today demonstrates that the Heart Association is deserving of support in its battle against crippling heart ailments.

I should also like to pay tribute to Debbie's parents, Mr. and Mrs. James Quinn, whose courage, love, and devotion have helped their daughter win her battle for a normal and healthful life.

AREA ECONOMIC REDEVELOPMENT

Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Speaker, because I feel quite strongly that the many areas in the United States that are suffering from substantial and persistent unemployment and underemployment, in many instances, of a tragically prolonged period, must have Federal assistance to overcome their economic redevelopment problems, I have introduced today a measure calling for the establishment of an Area Redevelopment Administration.

My bill, which is identical to the area redevelopment measure introduced by Senator DOUGLAS, of Illinois, for himself and 38 cosponsors and by Members of this body, is substantially the same as a similar measure passed by the 85th Congress, only to be vetoed by President Eisenhower.

Under the terms of the bill, Mr. Speaker, Federal loans would be authorized totaling $300 million and grants totaling $75 million to go to qualified areas of chronic unemployment and underemployment, both industrial and rural. Four and a half million dollars for technical aid to redevelopment areas would also be made available. Loans made from the two $100 million revolving funds—one for industrial projects in industrial redevelopment areas and the other for industrial projects in rural redevelopment areas—are to be for a 30-year period. Loans made from the third $100 million revolving fund, established to improve and develop depressed area community facilities so as to enhance the opportunities in the area for the attraction or expansion of industrial or commercial plants and facilities, will run for 40 years. Loans made will bear interest at the rate of one-half of 1 percent above the Treasury's borrowing cost.

I have information, Mr. Speaker, to the effect that in the State of Indiana, alone, there are six labor market surplus areas suffering from chronic economic distress and would therefore be eligible for assistance; they are Evansville, Terre Haute, Michigan City-La Porte, Muncie, Richmond, and Vincennes. In July of 1956 these 6 areas had a population of between 550,000 and 600,000, or approximately 13 percent of the State's total.

In addition, I am informed that in the Sixth District of Indiana, the city of Terre Haute and surrounding area, 1 of Indiana's 2 major economically distressed areas, with a 1956 population of 105,000 has been a labor-surplus area almost continuously since World War I; that its depressed status is attributable to long-term declines in manufacturing, coal mining, and supporting trade and service activities; and, that unemployment exceeded 9 percent of the labor force from 1954 through the middle of 1957.

As late as January 1958, Terre Haute's unemployment level was at 9 percent, with 4,200 of the 44,900 labor force out of work.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my unqualified support for this and all similar measures introduced by Members of both bodies, from both sides of the aisle. These distressed communities in Indiana and elsewhere in the country are in dire need of assistance if they are to regain their economic health and thereby be in a position to contribute materially to our Nation's industrial strength.

PROVIDING ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR DIRECT LOANS TO VETERANS

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 154 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2256) to amend chapter 37 of title 38, United States Code, to provide additional funds for direct loans; to remove certain requirements with respect to the rate of interest on guaranteed loans; and for other purposes. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed two hours to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer their names:

[Roll No. 3]

Barrett	Fogarty	Passman
Buckley	Green, Pa.	Powell
Bush	Hagen	Preston
Carnahan	Jackson	Reed
Carter	Jensen	Scott
Chelf	Keith	Shelley
Cook	Landrum	Shipley
Curtis, Mo.	Lennon	Smith, Calif.
Davis, Tenn.	Levering	Taylor
Dawson	Martin	Whitener
Dixon	Meader	Withrow
Donohue	Miller, N.Y.	Zelenko
Farbstein	Murray

The SPEAKER. On this rollcall 390 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

PROVIDING ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR DIRECT LOANS TO VETERANS

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 154 makes in order the consideration of H.R. 2256, the veterans' housing bill. The resolution provides for an open rule and 2 hours of general debate on the bill.

The bill is designed to provide additional funds for direct loans to veterans and to increase the ceiling on the interest rate for veterans' loans.

First. The direct loan program was created because the guaranteed loan program was not providing an equitable opportunity for all veterans to obtain a home loan. The guaranteed loan program functioned in metropolitan areas but has been of little benefit to veterans living in small cities and towns and rural areas.

Second. There has been such a heavy demand for this type of loan that the funds previously provided have been seriously depleted, and as of April 1958 there were over 13,000 veterans on the waiting list for direct loans. As of November 1, 1958, over 43,000 veterans were on the direct loan waiting list.

Third. The current rate of interest has been too low to attract lenders to make loans under the guaranteed loan plan.

Fourth. The bill provides for a fund of $300 million for direct loans and increases the ceiling on the rate of interest for all loans from the present 4¾ percent to 5¼ percent.

There appears to be a very great need for enactment of this legislation in order to take care of those veterans, particularly in the rural areas, who cannot obtain the funds under the guaranteed loan plan.

I urge the adoption of House Resolution 154.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. BUDGE] and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BUDGE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, while I do not appear here in opposition to the adoption of the rule because I feel this matter should be fully debated, there are three things which should be called to the attention of the membership of the House in connection with this legislation.

First, within the first 30 days, at the very beginning of this Congress, we are called upon to vote on a proposition to exceed the President's budget by $300 million.

Second, the procedure called for in this legislation, whereby a direct pipeline is made into the United States Treasury to obtain the $300 million, is without even the consideration of one of the great committees of this House; namely, the Committee on Appropriations. I feel it is not only improper, but I think it is also unconstitutional to appropriate money in this fashion.

There is one other element involved. If we adopt this type of legislation, the House could very well end up in a situation where it loses its prerogative of starting appropriation bills. The other body has, in the past, successfully used this device by making a direct pipeline approach into the Treasury, and I know that, if we follow it in this body, we can certainly expect it from the other side of the Capitol.

Mr. Speaker, those three things, I think, should be borne in mind, and I believe each one of us should take a very close look before, this early in the session, for this purpose, and in this manner, we exceed the President's budget by $300 million.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Idaho has stated, this bill, if enacted, rejects the President's plea for a balanced budget. Bear that in mind. This is the first bill to be taken up in the Congress of the United States. It starts right off, I repeat, by rejecting the President's plea for a balanced budget.

Mr. Speaker, this bill authorizes $300 million for direct loans to veterans in the field of housing. At the present time and under the present law there is now $192 million available to be used for that purpose.

Now, the other body also, Mr. Speaker, has rejected the President's plea for a balanced budget. Last Friday the Committee on Banking and Currency of that body favorably reported—and it is now before the other body—the omnibus housing bill which authorizes appropriations in the amount of $2,925 million. The administration housing bill provides for but $1,650 million. Thus the housing bill in the other body goes over the President's budget by over $1.3 billion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have been in session here about a month. These are the only two bills that have been before the Congress. Here we come with these two bills amounting to over $1.5 billion over the President's budget.

Now, how can we possibly talk about having a balanced budget when there are going to be scores and scores of other bills; when the first two bills that we have go over the President's recommendations for a balanced budget by $1.5 billion?

Since the November elections, Mr. Speaker, we have continually read in the press that this is going to be a radical Congress; that it would not have any financial responsibility whatsoever. And, I am saying now, with these first two bills coming before the Congress which exceed the President's budget by $1.5 billion, that we are rejecting his plea for a sound, stable fiscal policy. I just cannot be for this sort of thing.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY].

Mr. GARY. Mr. Speaker, I want it understood that I am not opposing this rule nor am I opposing this bill. I do, however, want to call attention to one thing which appears in this bill which illustrates a growing menace to our entire fiscal situation. That is the so-called back-door approach to the U.S. Treasury.

Mr. Speaker, we are supposed to have very definite rules with reference to handling our fiscal matters. There has been a tendency in recent years, however, to bypass the Congress, to bypass the regular appropriation processes, and to give various agencies of the Government the authority to borrow directly from the U.S. Treasury, and to grant contract authority for these agencies to obligate and spend money without the annual supervision and review by the Congress over such spending.

Let me show you just exactly to what extent this has progressed. In the 2d session of the 85th Congress there were bills, originated by and passed by the Senate, which bypassed the regular appropriation processes, amounting to $9,110,196,000 which involved the use of the so-called public debt transaction or contract authority devices.

There were bills passed in the House, and most of those were these Senate bills, involving the same devices, totaling $4,575,196,000.

There were enacted into law bills—other than appropriation bills—carrying those devices totaling $4,164,196,000, and those bills exceeded the President's budget requests by a net amount of $149,196,000. I have in my hand a list of those bills. There is a total of 16 bills, and 12 of them originated in the Senate.

It has been the unvarying practice from the beginning that appropriation bills originate in the House of Representatives. These are appropriation bills. Why do I say so? I do not ask you to take my word for it. All I ask you to do is look at the Constitution of the United States, which states:

> No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.

These bills do draw large sums from the Treasury of the United States; therefore, they are appropriation bills.

If they are not appropriation bills the money is being withdrawn from the Treasury contrary to the provisions of the Constitution. That, it seems to me, is the inescapable fact. Although they are appropriation bills they are not being handled as such.

Do you know there will be submitted in the near future, according to the recent budget message, supplemental appropriations requests for fiscal year 1959, which ends June 30, totaling $8,715 million, and, of that amount, $5,375 million involves this principle of the back-door approach to the Treasury of the United States? In other words, less than half of that tremendous sum would normally go through the regular annual appropriations process if we continue to follow these improper and diffused procedures. And there are more such items proposed for the coming fiscal year 1960. I include the following table:

Some idea of the current dimensions of bypasses of the regular appropriations process (public debt and contract authorities)

1. In the 2d sess., 85th Cong.:
(a) Total of Senate passed bills	$9,110,196,000
(b) Total of House passed bills (excludes some from committees which were defeated on floor)	4,575,196,000
(c) Total amount enacted (excludes $437 million airport bill passed but vetoed)	4,164,196,000
(d) Final enactments exceeded the budget requests by net amount of	+149,196,000
2. Proposed supplementals for fiscal 1959 to be submitted to the present session (6 propositions)	5,375,000,000
3. Amounts in 1960 budget (and for 1960) which would also be processed outside the regular appropriations procedure:
(a) Requiring action this session:
Airport construction	65,000,000
Urban renewal capital grants	250,000,000
	315,000,000

Some idea of the current dimensions of bypasses of the regular appropriations process (public debt and contract authorities)—Continued

3. Amounts in 1960 budget, etc.—Continued
(b) Not requiring action because they will become available in 1960 under previous "bypassing" laws:
VA direct loans	150,000,000
Farm tenant mortgage insurance fund	30,000,000
Maritime stuff	2,696,000
Public health	510,000
Roads, Indians	12,620,000
Roads, Park Service	34,000,000
Total for 1960—budget requests	544,826,000

NOTE.—Of course, these are budget figures. If legislative committees greatly exceed them on such things as housing, depressed areas, airports, etc., the totals will be much bigger.

Now you say: What harm is done? What is the effect of it? Well, the effect is just this: You do not have an adequate review by the Congress of the funds that are being spent by the Government agencies. It is taking the control of these funds away from the Congress of the United States. I am certain every Member of this House has heard many speeches about Congress losing control of the purse. This is probably the single most important way it is being lost.

The Congress, for example, authorizes an agency to borrow $2 billion directly from the Treasury for certain expenditure purposes. There is no provision for regular annual review as to how that money is spent. So long as that condition exists, the Congress of the United States is not discharging its duty. With our duty to appropriate money comes the responsibility of seeing that the money appropriated is properly spent—and the proper and time-honored way is the annual appropriations process.

I think one of the smartest things—just as an illustration—that this Congress ever did was with reference to foreign aid. I have had the privilege of serving on the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations that has handled that particular appropriation since its inception, and it was my privilege for a long time to be chairman of that subcommittee—when we started the foreign aid program there was a suggestion that a general authorization be given. But, the Congress said, "No—a program of this kind should be reviewed annually. In that way we can control the program and check on it every year." Therefore, the Congress provided for a double review annually, because it required an annual authorization. Every year the administration has had to come before this body; go first to the Committee on Foreign Affairs for an authorization for the appropriation of funds for the next fiscal year and then, after Congress acts on that, the administration has to request an appropriation and go before the Committee on Appropriations to justify the request. I want to say to you that this process alone has saved this Nation billions of dollars, and at the same time has provided adequate funds for the foreign aid program. We have had adequate programs and, at the same time, they have been under the strict annual—I want to stress annual—review of the Congress.

In my judgment, one of the greatest problems facing this Nation today is our fiscal situation. I know the menace from abroad. I know that we are facing one of the most ruthless enemies that the world has ever known. I know that we have to make expensive provision for our national defense, but let us understand thoroughly that a sound fiscal policy is a vital and essential part of our national defense, because a bankrupt nation cannot defend itself.

I would not say that this Nation is near bankruptcy, but I do say to you that we have a situation whereby we are spending tremendous sums of money every year. I have those figures before me. During the last 6 calendar years we have collected $444 billion in taxes from our people. Notwithstanding that fact, our Federal debt has increased alarmingly. We are facing in the current fiscal year a deficit of $12,900,000,000. We talk about a balanced budget for next year. But the facts are that if we do not watch out, we are going to face a deficit again next year. If we cannot balance our budget in these times of prosperity, what will we do when we face times of adversity? We as Members of Congress should assume our responsibility and properly review appropriations before they are enacted. We can't balance the budget when we have no control over backdoor spending. We must see that appropriation bills are properly handled, that all funds are handled according to the proper appropriation process, and that what money we do spend is properly spent and that no more is spent than is absolutely essential. The time-honored way, the time-tested way has been the annual congressional appropriations review. Let us follow the Constitution and get this business of handling appropriations back on the right track.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY] has expired.

Mr. BUDGE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, the minority leader [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY] knows of my great affection for him, but I must say the speech he has just made is the best speech that could possibly be made against the inclusion of the $300 million in this bill which we do not need. I agree with him about the matter of fiscal responsibility, but there is a time to start, and right now is the time. I want the people of this country to know that we are in the minority, 283 as against 153, and you have got the votes to spend an additional $300 million if you want to do it. But if I have my way the people of the country are going to know just who is doing it, and they are going to know the consequences that will follow from irresponsible action.

I might say to my friends that this seems to be the opening of the battle of the budget. Already the budget busters are on the move. I am a little surprised to see my good friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. TEAGUE] apparently in the forefront of the budget busters.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Is it not true that the President asked that the interest rate on VA home loans be increased?

Mr. HALLECK. Yes.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. And is it not true that he said if there was a realistic interest rate it would take care of the veterans' housing problem?

Mr. HALLECK. Well, I only yielded for a brief question.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I want to make one point. It has been said that if a realistic interest rate does take care of veterans' needs, VA does not have to draw any of this $300 million. It is not mandatory. It is permissive. It will be up to the Administration. If private capital will do the job and liquidate the waiting list all of these funds will not be needed. If private lenders do not do the job with this interest rate increase, we will expect VA to use these direct loan funds.

The gentleman from Indiana has expressed surprise regarding my position on this bill to provide an opportunity for veterans in rural areas to obtain a home loan. I would like to say to the gentleman that I am equally surprised to see this issue being converted into a political football. Our committee has functioned on a nonpartisan basis. The adoption of the interest rate amendment was nonpartisan. The adoption of the amendment to add additional direct loan funds in the committee was nonpartisan and there were only two dissenting votes on the passage of the bill.

My committee was working to find a way to provide money for veterans to finance home loans. It surprises me that the gentleman from Indiana has not approached this bill in the same spirit. The gentleman's own district and State provide good examples of the needs for this legislation. The survey recently conducted by the committee shows that there are approximately 36,620 veterans residing in the gentleman's district and that the direct loan funds in the program at the present time were sufficient to provide only 15 direct loans in his district during the period April to December 1958.

There are five counties in the gentleman's district where not a single direct loan was made, yet there were 940 Indiana veterans on the direct loan waiting list in December 1958. The gentleman's district is quite similar to many of the rural areas throughout the Midwest and Southwest.

In 1956, after the veterans' housing program had operated 10 years, we checked every county in the United States. The following percentages of veterans in several of the counties in the gentleman's district had obtained loans:

County:	Percentage
Benton	11.8
Carroll	13.7
Fulton	14.8
Jasper	6.6
Kosciusko	15.6

County:	Percentage
Newton	17.8
Pulaski	12.9
Starke	8.7

These percentages compare to the national average of 25.2 of all veterans who had obtained a home loan at the time of the survey. The State of Indiana is below the national average, having an average of 23.5 use of eligibility. I have pointed out the counties which I have mentioned fall below both the State average and national average in the use of entitlement.

In view of the limited opportunity which veterans in Indiana have had to participate in the home loan program, it appears to me that the gentleman from Indiana would be joining with the committee in passing this bill rather than seeking to capitalize on it in a political way.

It seems to me that the gentleman from Indiana has chosen a poor example. As the gentleman knows the money used in this program is not lost to the Treasury of the United States. As a matter of fact, the direct loan program is showing a very nice return to the taxpayers even though it was not created primarily for that purpose. The program has returned $45,578,552 in interest to the Treasury. The direct-loan program for World War II veterans is scheduled to expire in June 1960 and the program for Korean veterans is scheduled to expire in June 1965. After that time all repayments of principal and interest will revert to the Treasury and since veterans have a record of paying off their loans on an average of 10 years, it is apparent that the entire amount which has been authorized for direct loans will be soon returned to the Treasury with interest and there will be no resulting losses at all to the taxpayers. On the contrary, the program will show a net gain to the taxpayers running into the hundreds of millions of dollars by 1965.

Mr. HALLECK. I understand that the Administrator may draw the money at his discretion, but we have got a responsibility to meet right here. Rather than to vote the expenditure, why not go ahead with this realistic interest rate which will make it possible for private capital to do the job? Then if they cannot do the job they can come in and ask for more money. There will be close to $200 million direct-loan money available to begin with.

Let me say with reference to deficit spending, already in three bills that have been started, the President's budget would be thrown out of balance about $3 billion. And here you add on another $300 million which I assume would not be voted if we did not expect to spend it.

Then, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY] said, continued deficit spending means further inflation—ruinous inflation.

We on our side are going to do our best to hold down the increase in the cost of living that the housewife has to pay. We are going to fight the dissipation of the value of savings, of the people who have put their money in dollar investments; yes, and the retirement pay and disability pay of the veterans themselves.

Actually there is no need for this additional $300 million. I am going to support the rule. An amendment will be offered to strike out the $300 million, and I shall support it.

I would like to interject that I am a little surprised, but not too much, at the great haste with which this bill has been brought to the floor and was brought out of the committee. I have picked up a little information this morning, that even the members of the committee are not familiar with what the necessities are. I suppose it was a move based on the supposition that our existing fiscal responsibility would be embarrassed by having to vote on a bill like this, labeled as the first veterans' bill. Now, you are not going to embarrass me. I do not know how many more I can speak for, but it is not going to embarrass me to support an amendment to strike out the $300 million because I know that amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. AYRES. I think it should be pointed out that although this is known as a veterans' housing bill, this bill does not apply to any veterans living in a metropolitan area; this bill applies only to veterans in remote rural areas.

Mr. HALLECK. Of course. I cannot yield further at the moment. I want to respond to that, because that was a primary purpose for which this program was developed. The necessity in that respect is all eliminated. Day after day after day last year we had a general housing bill under consideration and we heard the dire predictions of the gentlemen on the Democratic side who said that if we did not pass that bill housing would just stop in this country, but the fact is that there were more housing starts in 1958 than in any other year but one.

The new housing starts in December of 1958 projected on an annual basis reached an alltime high, and it was 1,400,000 per year. So you see actually those dire predictions did not come to pass.

I say this program of $300 million is not necessary. It is not necessary because there will be available almost $200 million: $150 million authorized in legislation now on the books; $42 million out of principal payments, and between $3 and $4 million that will come from the sale of some of these properties.

I would like to point out to you one other proposition to establish, I hope to the satisfaction of everyone on my side of the aisle, and I hope some on the other who may be concerned about what might happen if this $300 million is not provided, that needs are being met.

For slightly over a year now, the Federal Housing Administration has been conducting the certified agency program on an experimental basis. This program makes the benefits of FHA financing available to veterans and others in rural areas and smaller towns that are distant from FHA insuring offices. There has been close cooperation with the voluntary home mortgage credit program which is also helpful to veterans in rural areas, in this effort.

In the certified agency program, greater responsibility is delegated to the financial institution that originates the application. With the cooperation of fee appraisers and inspectors, qualified and assigned by the FHA, the lender processes the loan to closing. By this system FHA maintains established standards of credit analysis, appraisal and inspection as it extends its usefulness to home buyers that are in less accessible areas.

In January 1958 CAP was just getting started and only one loan had been closed and two committed under this program. Progress during the year was steady and several new areas were added to the experiment as the year progressed. It promises to be a real force in providing financing for veterans.

Announcement has already been made of plans to extend CAP on a nationwide basis. The expansion will be subject to receipt of additional insurance authorization, careful training of agents, appraisers, and inspectors, and will be limited to towns of 20,000 population and less, in areas distant from the insuring offices and branches.

Reception to this program has been exceedingly good in the experimental areas and indications are that the program is effectively extending FHA into additional territories. As of December 31, 1958, 18,566 loans had been committed and 7,461 loans had been closed. Taking into account the very limited area and time of the program's operation, this is considered an excellent response and would indicate on the basis of an average mortgage loan of approximately $10,000, a volume of approximately $265 million either insured or committed.

I feel confident that the certified agency program is a sound concept which, so long as it is wisely administered, will result in many benefits to the home-buying public and especially to veterans in smaller communities and rural areas.

In other words, the FHA is developing a program that takes advantage of private capital through the guarantee of the amount and the loans are being made in that fashion. With that kind of a program moving at full speed ahead, utilizing as it does the processes of FHA, to which we all subscribe, why, may I ask you people who talk about fiscal responsibility, should we provide for the spending of $300 million more and throw the President's budget way out of balance when you are going to have available for direct loans $200 million, with a realistic interest rate, in which everyone who may reasonably be expected to get help in securing homes will be provided that help?

When it is offered, let us adopt the amendment to strike this $300 million. Let us start out with a good word to the country that, having regard to the dangers and the perils of continued deficit financing and excessive spending, they can be assured we are going to stop deficit spending. We can only do that by exercising the sort of courage that sometimes is mighty useful around certain places.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7½ minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the new Members—the old Members are aware of the fact—may I say that this is the same argument we have at the beginning of each session of the Congress. Of course, the argument discounts the balancing of the budget of the American people, it discounts the protection to American people from floods. It seems that some of our Republican friends have taken the floor in recent days to talk about the floods that took place recently in Ohio. But each year we hear the same battle cry with a Republican President and a Democratic Congress.

What happened in recent years? In 1957 the President's budget message estimated the fiscal year 1958 receipts to be $73,600 million and expenditures of $71,800 million, or a surplus of $1,800 million. The newspapers gave great importance to the balanced budget. That was the battle cry of the administration.

A year later, on January 13, 1958, the budget message receipts for the fiscal year 1958 were reestimated at $72,400 million and expenditures at $72,800 million, or a deficit of $400 million.

The January 1959, budget showed the actual 1958 receipts at $69,100 million and expenditures at $71,900 million, or a deficit of $2,800 million.

So the much advertised estimated surplus of $1,800 million became a deficit of $2,800 million, a difference of $4,800 million.

The Congress during that session reduced the President's budget message; just the same as we reduced it in the 85th Congress, by over $5,600 million.

Let us take the present fiscal year and see what the estimates are. We remember a year ago the same cry that there was a balanced budget, that the President had sent up a balanced budget. The January 13, 1958, President's budget estimate for fiscal year 1959 showed receipts of $74,400 million and expenditures of $73,900 million, or a surplus of $500 million.

Again the argument was made about a balanced budget. However, the President's budget message of January 19, 1959, gave a corrected estimate of receipts of $68 billion, expenditures $80.9 billion, or a deficit of $12.9 billion. Nearly a year ago the Joint Committee on Taxation of the Committee on Ways and Means, when the administration was telling the country there would be a surplus, estimated there would be a deficit of between $11 billion and $12 billion, despite the fact that in the last session of the Congress we reduced the President's budget estimate by $617,242,723 and in the previous session we reduced the President's budget estimate by over $5 billion. So, during the last Congress, the 85th Congress, there was a reduction in the President's budget estimates in 2 years of over $5.6 billion. And, who is going to say that we will not reduce? Who is going to say that the Congress will not reduce the President's budget estimate? That does not mean to say that we have to hew the line to what he recommends. We can use our own judgment. But, here in January they are making the same cry that they made in January of last year and in January of the year before of a balanced budget, when the administration itself, by its own act, unbalanced the budget in this fiscal year by $12.9 billion.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, I yield——

Mr. HALLECK. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. McCORMACK. For a question.

Mr. HALLECK. I listened to the speech of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY] a little bit ago, and if I heard him correctly, it was that the supplemental appropriations for this current fiscal year would be something over $8 billion, as I remember. Has the gentleman taken that into account in portraying the magnificent accomplishments of the 85th Congress in respect to balancing the budget?

Mr. McCORMACK. The difference of $12.9 billion is on estimates given to the Congress by the President of the United States. The Congress itself, in the 85th Congress, reduced the President's budget estimate by $5.6 billion. So, the Congress has reduced it. If there is any spending, it is a spending President and not a spending Congress.

Now let us come to the bill under consideration. This is not the first time that legislation of this type has come before the Congress. In 1950 there was direct housing loans by the Veterans' Administration for veterans. Furthermore, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation started through this method; the Federal Home Loan Banks started through this method; the Home Owners Loan Corporation the same way; the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation; the Federal National Mortgage Association; the Rural Electrification Administration; Public Housing Administration; Commodity Credit Corporation. There is a long list of important progressive pieces of legislation that had to start through the employment of the method engaged in this bill. Those who are opposed to progressive legislation always take a position in opposition to certain provisions being included in any bill. If that opposition had prevailed, much of the progressive legislation of the past years now on the statute books would never have been enacted into law.

To me, the amazing thing is that some of those who come down here now and who will come down here when public housing comes up and who are opposed to the provisions of that bill are the loudest in demanding that the same provisions be included in the Commodity Credit Corporation bill, be included in connection with agriculture. I supported them on that occasion, but they talk one way when a bill affects them and they talk another way when a bill affects another part of our country.

Mr. BUDGE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, my original intent is to discuss the general overall problem presented by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY], because I feel that the problem he sets forth is one that is of major seriousness and consequence to the country and a matter that this Congress should meet head on.

As the gentleman from Virginia indicated, there is a provision in this legislation which is another attempt by a back-door means and method to have an adverse impact on the Federal Treasury. I refer specifically to that portion of the bill on page 1, beginning in line 5, as follows:

> In addition to the sums authorized in this subsection, the Secretary of the Treasury shall also advance to the Administrator such additional sums, not in excess of $300 million as the Administrator may request, and the sums so advanced shall be made available without regard to any limitation contained in this subsection with respect to the amount which may be advanced in any one quarter annual period.

That particular language is an amendment to the basic act. On page 3 of the committee report you will find the basic legislation in toto, with the language I have just read included in its appropriate place.

If you read this language on page 30 of the committee report I think you will come to the same conclusion that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY], others, and I have come to, that this is a very unsound, unwise method of making funds available to the various agencies of our Government. First, I join with the gentleman from Virginia in the conclusion that this particular funding method is basically unconstitutional. Secondly, it takes from this body, the House of Representatives, its prerogative to have original review of appropriation proposals, or spending bills. Thirdly, I think this approach is fundamentally fiscally irresponsible.

I think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY] pointed out, but if he did not, it should be pointed out that in the last session of Congress there were some 16 legislative proposals that had provisions similar in effect to this one. Twelve of those bills originated in the other body, and only 4 in this body. We in the House should object to this situation as a limitation on our constitutional and traditional prerogative.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORD. I would be very glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. The gentleman from Massachusetts was correct, as far as he went, when he told about the reductions that were made by the 85th Congress through the regular appropriations process, but he did not tell about the nearly $4 billion increase over the budget request which was also enacted by the same 85th Congress, where the money went out of the Treasury through these back-door provisions in legislative bills outside the appropriations process. That means that the savings through cutting the appropriations estimates in the regular appropriations bills were substantially wiped out by the increase in the back-door withdrawals. The back-door withdrawals are the things we have before us right now and that will bankrupt the United States.

Mr. GARY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARY. It not only means that the savings were wiped out, but it means that any opportunity for savings was wiped out because there was no review allowing us an opportunity for savings in those bills.

Mr. FORD. I wholeheartedly agree with the observations of the gentleman from New York and those of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY].

As I was about to say, the other body in 12 instances in the last session of the Congress, in effect, originated appropriation bills. According to the Constitution, and interpretations of the Constitution, that is an inappropriate action for them to take, and it seems to me that we, in this body, should be jealous of our responsibilites and our obligations in this area. We should prevent now and in the future the inclusion of such language in all bills that originate in this body or in the other body.

I would like to emphasize the point that, in my judgment, this kind of provision is fiscally irresponsible. The gentleman from Massachusetts has pointed out that in the first session of the 85th Congress, the House and Senate by the recommendations of their respective committees on appropriations reduced the new obligational authority requested by the President to the extent of slightly over $5 billion. However, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts failed to point out that in the same session of the Congress the House and Senate increased the President's request for the right to obligate by this back-door method over $2,700 million. Those facts and figures are pointed out on page 80 and 81 of hearings on the 1960 budget which were just concluded by the House Committee on Appropriations.

As a matter of fact, by this back-door method in the first session of the 85th Congress, the President recommended legislation which would have made available $3,168,905,000, but the Congress by this irresponsible method upped that availability to $5,807,751,000, increasing the President's budget in this area by over $2.7 billion. In the second session of the 85th Congress, the House and Senate reduced the new obligational authority through the Appropriations Committees by the sum of $617 million. But, on the other hand, in the last session of the Congress by this back-door method, the House and Senate went beyond the President's budget and, in effect, increased the availability of obligational authority.

In my judgment and in my opinion, we should stop this kind of funding, that I indicated in the language on page 1 of the bill. I am convinced that if we strike that language in this bill and in subsequent bills, we will get a higher degree of fiscal responsibility.

Let me point out again in another way what I mean. All of you have or should have a copy of the Federal Budget in Brief. If you will turn to page 55 of that document, you will find this language:

> In 1953 unexpended balances carried forward at the end of the year from appropriations was $78.4 billion.

By constant pressure from the Congress those unexpended balances in a period of about 8 years have been reduced to $41.5 billion. In other words, in 1953 the unexpended balance was $78.4 billion. At the end of fiscal 1960 it is estimated it will be $41.5 billion. That is a reduction in unexpended balances of approximately $37 billion. To me that shows that the Congress in the regular appropriation processes has done a good job and was able to get a higher degree of fiscal responsibility.

If you will go down to a line below in this same chart you will find this, "From other authorizations, authorizations to spend from debt receipts"—that is the process and procedure which is in this paragraph—you will find that at the end of fiscal 1953 the unexpended balance in this category totaled $20.2 billion. If you will go across the page you will find at the end of fiscal 1959 the unexpended balance in this category will probably go up to $26 billion, an increase of $5.8 billion.

I am only seeking to illustrate that when we use this faulty method of financing the Congress loses fiscal control, the Congress loses the ability to intelligently scan, item by item, the requests for expenditure. When we do that we find that the unexpended balances increase. That is a condition which we should not condone. One way to stop it is to eliminate this kind of provision in this bill or in any other bill. Then we can return to the kind of control which has brought a reduction in unexpended balances from appropriation, from $78.4 billion down to $41.5 billion over the same period of time.

It is my judgment that this legislation, with this kind of provision in it, is unsound, unwise and fiscally irresponsible, and I hope and trust it is defeated if this provision is retained.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD. I yield.

Mr. ARENDS. I just want to say that I agree entirely with the position which the gentleman takes. Further I would like to say to the House that some years ago there was a Member from Pennsylvania, Mr. Rich, with whom many of the older Members had the privilege of serving, who always asked the $64,000 question which should be in the minds of everybody today: "Where are you going to get the money?"

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ROONEY). The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BUDGE. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remaining time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, why did the Founding Fathers in the Constitution provide that no funds should be withdrawn from the Treasury except by appropriation made by the Congress?

This was the reason: They knew that bureaucratic control and bureaucratic management was irresponsible and that the people could not be protected from the bureaucrats except by requiring that the money that was withdrawn from the Treasury must be withdrawn on appropriations made by the Congress.

I ran into a story yesterday that made me realize just how irresponsible bureaucrats are. They were going to build a six-room schoolhouse for Indian children. That was fine; but what do you suppose they brought in for architects and engineers' fees for that job? Two hundred and thirty thousand dollars—almost half enough to build the schoolhouse.

Are we going to continue to allow the bureaucrats to fritter away money forever? The only salvation for the United States is the control by Congress of the right to appropriate money, and unless we preserve that right and maintain our liberties in that field, we are gone.

Let us not be fooled into voting for something we know is wrong and is the wrong way to do it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. What is the use of having the gentleman's committee, the Appropriations Committee, if we adopt this kind of procedure?

Mr. TABER. It is gradually growing bigger and bigger, and the waste is becoming worse and worse. That is why, as I understand, the gentleman from Virginia offered an amendment to the rules of the House which would correct this situation. I hope we will meet our responsibility and not let any more money flow out of the Treasury by the back door.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I wish to talk about the question that has been raised here this morning of this back-door approach to the Treasury, as it is called. I would like first to make clear how that situation developed. It came about by provisions in authorization bills which state that the administrator of the agency in question may issue notes. He may take those notes to the Treasurer of the United States, and the Secretary of the Treasury is required to cash those notes and treat it as a transaction under the Second Liberty Loan Act. In that way the review of appropriations never gets to the House of Representatives, or to the Senate, for that matter.

This thing has been going on for a long time in small fashion; last year it mushroomed. As you have heard, over $9 billion of bills came to the House with that provision in them; and although the other body is prohibited under our rules from initiating appropriations, and is prohibited under the direct terms of the Constitution from initiating revenue bills, 12 of those 16 bills which came before the House were bills coming from the other body.

I am one of those who believes that when you see something ought to be done, stop talking about it and act. I have introduced a resolution this morning to amend the rules so as to bring us back within the terms of constitutional legislation. That resolution will be referred to the Rules Committee. I very much hope the Rules Committee will bring it to the floor of the House in the near future. If that is done, this House will determine in a democratic way, and as it should, whether we shall pursue the course which we have been pursuing or whether we are going to conform to constitutional requirements.

I know certain people get tired of being told about the Constitution of the United States and, in view of what is going on in the country, I feel some hesitancy about mentioning that more or less outmoded document.

In the first place, as you have been told this morning, there is a specific provision in the Constitution—just a few words—which says that no money shall be withdrawn from the Treasury of the United States except by appropriation pursuant to law. Time and again here it has been held, and is the solid rule of the House of Representatives, that an appropriation is anything that permits money to be withdrawn from the Treasury without further action by the Congress.

The Constitution also specifically provides that all revenue measures must originate in the House of Representatives under the theory of the Constitution of the United States that the Members of the House are closest to the people bearing the burden of taxation. So the Constitution specifically gives this body sole and exclusive jurisdiction to originate revenue legislation.

The provision in this bill which I have spoken of concerning the Second Liberty Loan Act is an example. As I said to you before, 12 of those bills came here last year from the other body that had no jurisdiction to initiate legislation affecting tax measures.

I hope that the Members of the House will give some serious consideration to this problem. It is a tremendous problem. You cannot possibly keep up with your financing with this method of operation. All we are seeking to do is to say that before any money is appropriated or any means provided to withdraw it from the Treasury the matter shall come to the House, go to the Appropriations Committee, be considered by that committee and analyzed and acted on by the Committee on Appropriations. That is all there is to the proposition.

Mr. Speaker, I heard my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, the majority leader, talking about how all of these things which have been done for the benefit of the people would not have been done if we had not had this back-door-to-the-Treasury proposition. I am not proud of that statement. This House has always been able to act within the Constitution. There are ways it can be done. To say it cannot be done in any way except by violating the Constitution of the United States seems to me to be an inaccurate sort of a statement.

I have heard a lot of talk here this morning about the budget. We all want to balance the budget. I think every Member of the House wants to be responsible in our fiscal affairs. I wish we would not get so much politics into this because every time we get to talking about "who done it" each side says the other side did it. As a matter of fact, we did cut the President's budget by over $5 billion last year. But let me say to you gentlemen on my side of the aisle, we Democrats did not do it. Let me say to you gentlemen over there on the Republican side that you did not do it. It was done by the responsible membership of this House on both sides of the aisle, irrespective of political considerations, by Members who thought we ought to have a strong financial policy. That is the way it was done, and if it is done again that is the way it has got to be done.

I hope those Members of the House who feel as some of us do about the dire necessity of doing something about the expenditures of this Nation will stand together and irrespective of the line that runs down the middle of this Chamber here vote your convictions for a balanced budget and for a sound fiscal policy, without regard to political parties.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2256) to amend chapter 37 of title 38, United States Code, to provide additional funds for direct loans; to remove certain requirements with respect to the rate of interest on guaranteed loans; and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 2256, with Mr. THORNBERRY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Chairman, I certainly regret that the leadership on my left has chosen to make this veterans bill a political football. I wish that every Member of this House could have been in our committee the 2 days that we worked on this bill. Politics was never mentioned; it was never thought of in any way, form, or fashion. This bill is the result of a very sincere effort of a committee of this Congress to take care of a job that has been given to us of taking care of housing for veterans in this country. This is not an irresponsible bill. It is a good bill.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going into all of the details of our veterans' housing program. I am going to cover the two principal parts of this bill. One part of it is $300 million for direct loans; the other part of it is increasing the interest rate on guaranteed loans from 4¾ percent to 5¼ percent. The President of the United States recommends that we increase the interest rate. I have opposed this increase for many years. It finally boils down to the fact of whether or not you want fewer houses and have our veterans pay less interest or whether you want more houses and let them pay more interest. Our committee, after very careful deliberation, in the most nonpartisan atmosphere that you can imagine, voted to increase the interest rate. After that there was a vote to increase the amount from $150 million to $300 million for direct loans.

Now, first let me tell you a little about direct loans. There are over 45,000 veterans on the waiting list for direct loans. The Administrator had $150 million for the fiscal year 1959—July 1, 1958 to June 30, 1959. All that money has been drawn from the Treasury. It has been distributed by the VA central office. Now, if this 5¼ percent interest rate will provide money for housing, the Administrator for Veterans' Affairs does not have to draw one dime of this $300 million. If it does not produce the money to build veterans' housing, then he should draw it and we will expect him to do so. There has been a period in the past when he failed to draw $50 million that was available. So, it is up to the Administrator and the President whether they use this $300 million. The following charts show the activity in the VA direct loan program as compared with the VA guaranteed loan program:

NOTE.—Leaders (---) indicate areas not eligible for direct loans.

Now, more than that, when a veteran applies for a direct loan, the minute he does the Administrator lets it be known to the private lenders that this veteran has applied for a direct loan. If no private lender indicates he wants the paper he makes the loan. If the Administrator makes a builder-commitment, then within 60 days any lender can purchase this loan and get the two points paid for the commitment. After 60 days any private lender in the United States can pick up this paper or any direct loan any time he wants to at par. So if the administration thinks this 5¼ percent is going to provide ample money for loans, why are they complaining about this? There is no reason for it if what they say turns out to be true.

I am sure the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. AYRES] would not misinform this House. I understood him to say this bill had nothing to do with veterans in the metropolitan areas.

Mr. AYRES. Is the gentleman addressing a question to me?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio if he cares to comment on it. Before I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, I would like to say that the gentleman from Ohio and I have served on the Veterans' Affairs Committee for many years. The gentleman from Ohio has been a member of the Housing Subcommittee for many years and served as its chairman during the 83d Congress. The gentleman from Ohio is without question one of the best informed Members of this body on matters relating to veterans' housing.

Mr. AYRES. I said this was billed as a veterans' housing bill for all veterans. Actually the moneys in this bill apply only to those veterans in the rural communities that qualify for the direct loans in what the Veterans' Administrator has designated as being direct-loan areas. As far as the increase in the interest rate from 4¾ percent to 5¼ percent, that will help the veterans in the metropolitan areas get loans, which we all know they cannot get today.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. That is correct. The gentleman lives in a metropolitan area in his State of Ohio. About 35 to 40 percent of the veterans have been able to get VA-guaranteed loans. Yet there are other counties in Ohio where only 5, 6, or 7 percent of the veterans have been able to get loans. This bill is to help those veterans that cannot get loans any other way. The 5¼ percent should provide more guaranteed loan money for veterans in the metropolitan areas.

I want to read to you what the Veterans' Administrator told us is the present situation of the direct loan program:

Public Law 85-364 permitted a Treasury advance of up to $50 million during the fourth quarter of fiscal year 1958 and authorized $150 million in Treasury advances during each of fiscal years 1959 and 1960.

For 1959 there is about $40 million in the regional offices, but there is no more money due from the Treasury, and not a dime in the central office for additional loans until the 1st of July.

The funds which became available for the fourth quarter of fiscal year 1958 were allocated to our regional offices on a pro rata basis of their needs to provide loans to veterans on their March 1958 waiting lists. By the end of June 1958, loans made and in process had exhausted funds available and the waiting list had grown to nearly 35,000.

The maximum permissible Treasury advances have been obtained for the first three quarters of fiscal year 1959. These funds, together with the proceeds of sales and principal repayments on loans previously made, have been allocated to our regional offices on a pro rata basis of veteran population in designated housing credit shortage areas.

This is the present situation.

At the end of December 1958, loans made and in process were sufficient to absorb funds available as of that date and there were more than 45,000 on waiting lists. The funds which have been allotted to regional offices for making direct loans during the third quarter of fiscal year 1959 and the estimated principal repayments during the balance of this fiscal year—no Treasury advances being available for the fourth quarter—will be enough to make about 7,000 loans. Funds which will become available during fiscal year 1960 will be enough to make about 20,000 loans.

That means of the 45,000 veterans now on the waiting list, if you take the situation the gentleman from Indiana was talking about, this money will take care of about 35,000 loans through 1960, and this does not include all the new applications that will come in.

My committee tried desperately to meet this housing situation, and we have a good bill. Again, it is not an irresponsible bill.

In testimony before our committee it was indicated that VA's home loan activity has declined drastically during the past few months. As a result VA has reduced its personnel. VA officials have predicted that if the bill before us is enacted that their anticipated workload will double next year. This, of course, means that the VA Loan Guaranty Section will need additional money for personnel.

I expect to contact the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to urge him to anticipate this problem in his budget planning for the months ahead. I sincerely hope that our Appropriations Committee will recognize this problem when they consider the VA's budget.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I am just a little bit curious about why it is necessary on the direct loans to increase the amount of interest to make it the same as the guaranteed loans would get. But, it seems to me if we agree the interest rate for the guaranteed loans must be increased in order to get private capital, and if at the same time private capital even then is not forthcoming, should the veteran nevertheless be penalized when the Government makes a direct loan? Why should not his interest rate under that situation remain just the way it is now?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. The gentleman raises a very good point. The truth of the matter is the Administrator has the authority to set this interest rate. He has always set this rate the same as the guaranteed loans. Since the program began, we have lost on direct loans something over $1 million and we have made something over $40 million. So, I think the gentleman has an excellent point, and it is something that my committee probably should have looked into before this.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Would the gentleman be averse to my offering an amendment to the bill which would hold the direct loan interest rate to the amount which presently is charged in view of the fact that the program is making money?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. From what I know right now, I will say to the gentleman, I would not be able to agree with that. I would like to have a further study into the matter.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in order that the importance of this legislation may be better understood, I would like to review the history of the veterans' home loan program from its inception.

After World War II the returning veterans found themselves at a great disadvantage in trying to purchase homes. This disadvantage prevailed because they had no money for down payments to compete with the defense workers who had higher paying jobs and who were therefore able to accumulate a sizable saving for a down payment on a home. Further, homes were scarce and builders were unable to obtain commitments to build a sufficient number of homes to be financed with conventional financing and low down payments. In order to assist the returning veteran to readjust to civilian life, Congress passed the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944. This act included numerous benefits, such as the vast educational programs with which everybody is familiar, unemployment compensation, and loan guaranty benefits. This act was to run for 10 years after the date of termination of World War II, which was later established as July 25, 1947.

The Veterans' Administration loan guaranty program provided a guarantee to a private lender who was willing to finance the purchase of a home for a qualified veteran. The guaranty was 50 percent of the purchase price, but not to exceed $4,000. The loan was to be at 4 percent interest and could run for 20 or 25 years. This small amount of guaranty was used to guarantee the down payment portion of the purchase price of a home. A combination loan, with the Veterans' Administration guaranteeing part and the Federal Housing Administration insuring the remainder, assisted many a veteran in purchasing a home. However, the down payments and the monthly payments were rather high, having been scheduled according to requirements of the FHA.

This type of loan proved unsatisfactory, both from the standpoint of the veteran and the lender, and in 1950 Congress changed the law providing for an increase in the amount of guarantee to 60 percent of the sale price, or $7,500, whichever was the smaller. This new act proved to be the solution in assisting veterans in purchasing homes and, in addition, it has proved to be one of the greatest underwriting steps ever taken in the mortgage field for the purchase of homes.

By 1950 Congress found that the veterans living in our rural areas, small cities, and towns, were failing to obtain private or conventional financing. This was primarily due to the fact that the large lenders refused to make loans in outlying areas because they could make all the loans they wanted in the greater metropolitan areas where servicing was no problem. In order to correct this inequity, Congress in 1950 authorized the Veterans' Administration direct loan program. This program provided $150 million and authorized the Administrator to make loans directly to veterans living in the rural areas, small cities, and towns where private or conventional financing was not available. The maximum amount for a direct loan was set by law at $10,000. The program immediately stimulated purchases of homes in the rural areas and veterans at once began making application for direct loans. The first appropriation of $150 million was soon used up. Since 1950 each Congress has extended the program and authorized additional sums of money. The funds authorized have proved to be insufficient each year, and a large waiting list of veterans desiring direct loans has been constantly in existence since 1950.

In 1951 the lenders slowed down the making of guaranteed loans, claiming that the 4-percent interest rate was not a sufficient yield for them and they began investing their money in other fields. Testimony was received by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs to the effect that the interest rate must be increased, or the VA loan guarantee program would become nonexistent. This was the first effect of the tight money market on the veterans' home loan program. Thus in order for veterans to continue to obtain financing, the VA Administrator considered it necessary to increase the ceiling on the Veterans' Administration interest rate to 4½ percent. This authority was provided in the 1948 amendment to the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944. Immediately after the ceiling was raised to 4½ percent, the lenders, again finding the veterans' loan attractive, made ample funds available for loans in the metropolitan areas.

Even this increase in interest rate did not assist veterans living in our rural areas to obtain private financing, and the direct-loan program was therefore extended, with an additional authorization of $150 million.

Both the guaranteed- and the direct-loan programs continued to provide homes for veterans until 1957, when the tight-money situation made mortgage funds unavailable for a veteran's 4½-percent guaranteed loan. Testimony was again presented to the committee by the lenders, stating that unless the interest rate was increased they would be unable to make any more VA loans because of the low yield which placed the veteran's loan at a disadvantage with other available loans paying the lenders higher rates of interest.

Mr. Chairman, I was opposed to the original increase in interest rate from 4 to 4½ percent because I felt that the veteran's guaranteed loan had many advantages for lenders over other guaranteed or insured Government home loans. These advantages were, and still are, that a lender making a veteran guaranteed loan receives his claim in cash upon foreclosure. Other Government-insured loans pay off in debentures. Further—and this is an outstanding advantage—in case the lender is unable to deliver physical possession of the property to the Veterans' Administration upon foreclosure, the VA will still pay in cash the lender's claim. Other governmental-insured loans demand that physical possession be given before a claim is paid, and even then the claim is paid in debentures. Notwithstanding these advantages, the Congress, caught in the tight-money dilemma, increased the ceiling on the interest rate again—from 4½ to 4¾ percent. This law went into effect on April 1, 1958—Public Law 85–364. This same law extended the direct-loan program and the loan-guaranty program for 2 years, making the expiration of both programs July 25, 1960, and increased the maximum amount of a direct loan from $10,000 to $13,500. It also gave the Administrator the authority to process all applications received on or before July 25, 1960—1 additional year for the closing of these loans.

Mr. Chairman, again when the interest-rate ceiling was increased, lenders flocked to the program and made ample funds available for guaranteed loans in the metropolitan areas and, as they had in the past, failed or refused to make mortgage funds available in the rural areas.

All of which brings us back to the bill we have before us today—H.R. 2256. This is the bill I introduced on January 12, 1959, for the purpose of providing additional funds for the Veterans' Administration direct loan program, as well as to effect additional legislation which I feel is necessary to assist the veterans of our country in obtaining housing.

As I mentioned before, the direct loan program was first authorized by the Congress in 1950, because it was found that the Veterans' Administration guaranteed loan program was not offering an equitable opportunity for veterans living in rural areas, small cities and towns to obtain home loans. On the other hand, the veterans living in the metropolitan areas have had little or no difficulty in obtaining mortgage financing.

My committee made a national survey and found that of 3,234,438 veterans living in 1,635 rural counties, less than 10 percent had obtained a loan to purchase a home. This compares with 2,857,307 veterans residing in 126 metropolitan counties where over 40 percent have obtained a guaranteed loan.

The VA guaranteed loan program has assisted over 5 million veterans in obtaining a home loan. The VA direct loan program has made loans to only 126,848 veterans. This small number of direct loans to veterans in the rural areas, small cities and towns, is due to the fact Congress has not authorized sufficient funds for the program to meet the demand.

Public Law 85–364, enacted by the second session of the 85th Congress, extended the direct loan program for 2 years and authorized $150 million for each of the fiscal years 1959 and 1960.

At the time this law was enacted there were about 13,000 veterans on the waiting list. It was found the reason so few veterans throughout the country had made application for a direct loan resulted from the well-known fact there were not sufficient funds in the direct loan program; thus many veterans who really need a direct loan did not bother to apply. As a result of the enactment of Public Law 85–364, the list of veterans wanting a direct loan grew and grew until today there are over 45,000 veterans on the waiting list. It will be noted from page 5 of the report on H.R. 2256 that there were 43,187 veterans on the VA direct loan program waiting list as of November 1, 1958. This number has increased to over 45,000 in a little more than 2 months.

Mr. Chairman, just the mention of over 45,000 veterans being on the waiting list today for a direct loan in itself does not really carry the true meaning of the VA direct loan waiting list. The real meaning back of this condition is that we have over 45,000 veterans who today cannot get a VA guaranteed loan from private lenders and unless Congress provides adequate funds for the direct loan program, those veterans—in all probability—will never be able to buy a home.

I might add that the direct loan program is not a gift to the veterans of our rural areas; it is a profitable investment of the taxpayers' money. The money authorized for the VA direct loan program will be repaid to the Treasury of the United States with interest. To date the loss from direct loans has been only eight-tenths of 1 percent, while the Government has been collecting from 4 to 4¾ percent interest, leaving almost 4 percent profit or gain on the investment. Since the inception of the direct loan program the Veterans' Administration has collected $113,794,542 in interest on the loans. A typical annual return on the direct loan program is about $26 million, based on the 4½ percent interest rate.

The committee took the large waiting list into consideration and in order to provide what seems to be a minimum amount of funds needed for the direct loan program, increased the amount, by amendment, from $150 million to $300 million. I might add that this amendment had the support of a large majority of the members of the committee.

Under the present law the VA interest rate is tied to the current interest rate set on FHA home insured loans. The interest rate on VA guaranteed and direct home loans cannot exceed one-half of 1 percent below the FHA home loan interest rate, or 4¾ percent, whichever is lower. The second provision, section 2, of this bill eliminates this tie.

During the hearings held on H.R. 2256, the officials of the Veterans' Administration testified that the VA guaranteed home loan program was almost nonexistent. Witnesses stated that the current VA interest rate of 4¾ percent was not realistic or competitive on today's mortgage market and recommended the VA Administrator be given authority to set a higher interest rate. They said that a higher interest rate would attract mortgage money and loans on veteran homes would become available immediately.

The committee heard from the Mortgage Bankers Association of America, the U.S. Savings and Loan League, the National Association of Home Builders, the National Association of Real Estate Boards, and the American Legion. This group concurred with the views of the Veterans' Administration and recommended the interest rate ceiling be increased. The committee also heard from the VFW and AFL–CIO. This group opposed increasing the interest rate. The committee was convinced that there would be little activity in the program without a higher interest rate and on this basis approved the amendment to increase the interest rate ceiling from 4¾ to 5¼ percent.

The increase in interest rate will result in an additional cost to veterans of our country amounting to many millions annually. Let us take an example of a $15,000 home with a 25-year loan. The added cost to the veteran would be $52.20 per year, due to the increased interest rate. Over the life of the loan this would mean an additional cost to the veteran of $1,305. Using the figure of 300,000 veteran home loans, the increase in interest rate will result in lenders receiving an additional $15,660,000 for their loans in 1959. This amount over the 25-year period of the loans will result in an increase to the lenders of $391,500,000.

An increase in interest rate will not only cost more for veterans who are able to qualify for a loan, but will also be the direct cause for the rejection of many veterans' applications due to their credit rating or insufficient income to pay the increased interest payments. Although the increased interest payment on a $15,000 home will be only $4.35 per month, this additional $4.35 will require the veteran to have an additional $20 monthly income in order to qualify for the loan. Many veterans who are today borderline cases—creditwise—for a 4¾-percent loan, will not be able to obtain approval for a loan with 5¼-percent interest rate.

The third provision of the bill, section 2(b), Mr. Chairman, authorizes all certified agents of any department of the Government to make Veterans' Administration automatic home loans.

Most lenders can make VA-guaranteed loans, but under the present law only Federal land banks, national banks, State banks, private banks, building and loan associations, insurance companies, credit unions, and mortgage and loan companies that are subject to State or Federal supervision can make automatic loans. All other lenders must submit the veteran's loan application for prior approval by the Veterans' Administration. An automatic loan saves delay in closing a loan and eliminates unnecessary paper shuffling between the lender and the Veterans' Administration.

The fourth provision of the bill, section 3, requires a builder or seller of homes in a subdivision containing five or more houses to deposit the veteran's downpayment in a special trust fund.

There have been numerous cases where veterans have taken their life savings and made a downpayment on a home and lost every cent due to the builder or seller declaring bankruptcy. There are about 20 States that have laws requiring deposits on the purchase of a home to be placed in special trust accounts. The code of ethics of the National Association of Real Estate Boards requires all deposits to be placed in special trust accounts.

The fifth provision of the bill, section 4, is in two parts. The first part authorizes the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to suspend a builder who has been suspended by FHA. The second part authorizes the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to suspend a lender who has been suspended by FHA. Under existing law the Federal Housing Commissioner has the legal authority to suspend participants from the FHA program, based solely on their suspension by the Veterans' Administration. This bill will give the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs similar authority.

Mr. Chairman, I requested the Mortgage Bankers Association, the U.S. Savings and Loan League, the National Association of Home Builders, the Veterans' Administration and the House and Home Finance Agency to give me a forecast or estimate on the effect the increase in interest rate from 4¾ to 5¼ percent will have on the VA home loan guaranty program for calendar year 1959. As I stated previously, the Veterans' Administration officials have stated that there is little or no money available today—at 4¾ percent—for veterans' home loans.

The Mortgage Bankers state that the VA guaranteed home loan program activity rose from 141,274 loans in 1952, to 391,789 in 1954, and to its peak in 1955 of 649,591 loans. The program declined to such an extent that in 1958, only 145,930 loans were approved. With the increase in interest rate to 5¼ percent they estimate that "a reaction of a similar sort may be expected to follow the interest rate adjustment now contemplated." They also estimate that even with the increase in interest rate to 5¼ percent, there will be discounts required by lenders of two to four points.

The discounts may be explained as points that a lender charges the builder or seller for making the loan. The discount cannot be charged to the veteran as a discount; however, there is no question but that the veteran pays the discount in the sales price or quality of his home. When lenders are not satisfied with the interest rate on a veteran's guaranteed home loan, they charge extra points or discounts to increase their yield. For example, a lender may make a $15,000 loan to a veteran at 5¼ percent and charge the builder or seller two to four points, or $300 to $600 cash, for making the loan. This increases the yield realized by the lender from 5¼ to 5¾ percent, or 6¼ percent, depending on the length of time the loan is to run.

With the proposed increase in interest rate there will be confusion and anxiety on the part of veterans who are in the process of purchasing a home. It goes without saying that the lenders have, since the Committee on Veterans' Affairs reported H.R. 2256, offered commitments to make veterans' home loans with an escalator clause in the commitment providing that the loan will be closed at 4¾ percent interest or the higher prevailing interest rate on the date of closing. This means that all loans from today forward will be closed at the high rate of interest if this bill is enacted. There will also be some lenders who will attempt to void their outstanding commitments to make veterans' loans at 4¾ percent, in order to get the new increased interest rate. The Veterans' Administration has authority under existing law to suspend builders and lenders who are guilty of unfair mortgage practices which are detrimental to a prospective veteran home buyer. Consequently, I am going to look to the Administrator to see that lenders who have outstanding commitments with no escalator clauses to make these loans to veterans at the 4¾-percent interest rate to fulfill these commitments, even though the interest rate is increased.

The U.S. Savings and Loan League's forecast of the effect on loans if the 5¼-percent interest rate is approved is that their members will lend an additional $1.1 billion in the VA-guaranteed home-loan program during the calendar year 1959. They state that the total amount of money to be made available under the new interest rate in 1959 will be about $1.6 billion, and they forecast that all types of lenders will make more than $5 billion for VA-guaranteed home loans during the calendar year 1959. The U.S. Savings and Loan League also forecasts that their members will charge from 3 to 4 points discount in some areas. This forecast is similar to that of the Mortgage Bankers' Association discussed previously.

The National Association of Home Builders submitted their estimate of the effects of the increase in interest to 5¼ percent on new housing starts. The Association of Home Builders say there will be between 130,000 and 150,000 new units. These new starts plus loans made on existing homes, which usually run 50–50, will mean that we can expect about 300,000 VA-guaranteed home loans to be made to veterans during the calendar year 1959 with 5¼-percent interest rates. The National Home Builders' Association says that without the increase in interest rate there would be about 70,000 to 90,000 new starts during the calendar year 1959, and the large majority of these would be from existing commitments that have been previously issued by lenders prior to the tight money situation we now find confronting us.

The Housing and Home Finance Agency forecasts that the increase in interest rate to 5¼ percent on VA-guaranteed home loans will increase the housing starts in 1959 from 50,000 to 100,000. This, added to the outstanding commitments for new starts of about 70,000, plus loans for existing homes will result in over 300,000 loans for veterans in 1959.

In making their forecast for 1959, the Veterans' Administration states that if H.R. 2256 is enacted into law by March 1, 1959, they anticipate closing 375,000 VA guaranteed home loans and 40,000 VA direct home loans. These figures compare with 145,930 guaranteed and 17,440 direct loans closed during 1958.

The voluntary home mortgage credit program was created by the Housing Act of 1954. This program was to be administered by the Housing and Home Finance Administrator with a staff of Government employees. However, the members and directors of the program were to be from private lending institutions who voluntarily joined the program. The purpose of the program was to acquaint all lenders with the need for mortgage financing in remote areas of our country and to induce them to set aside a certain portion of their mortgage allocations for housing construction loans in rural areas, small cities and towns. This program was to cooperate very closely with the Veterans' Administration and its direct loan program in an effort to channel private and conventional mortgage funds into these rural areas, thereby eliminating the necessity for the VA direct loan program. The lenders participating in the voluntary home mortgage credit program demanded discount points which virtually killed the program. In addition, the Voluntary Home Mortgage Credit Program Agency was able to get the Veterans' Administration to agree that if one of the voluntary home mortgage credit program lenders offered to make a veteran a conventional loan at reasonable discount points, the VA would refuse to make this veteran a direct loan. That is, if the seller refused to agree to the discount points. This, of course, worked a hardship on the veteran applicants for direct loans because, as I stated previously, the veteran cannot pay the discount points and in to numerous cases the seller of the home also refused to pay the discount points, placing the veteran in a position where he could not get either type of VA loan—direct or guaranteed.

My committee held hearings on this procedure and the Veterans' Administration revised its method of referrals of veteran applicants for direct loans to the voluntary home mortgage credit program, giving them a maximum number of days to find a lender or the Veterans' Administration would make the loan. Even under this arrangement the Administrator established a rule that a 2 point discount was not unreasonable and that if the seller would not agree to pay the 2 points, the veteran could not obtain either a guaranteed or a direct loan.

The day after H.R. 2256 was reported by my committee, the Voluntary Home Mortgage Credit Program Agency asked the Veterans' Administration to agree to refer veterans wanting direct loans to their program, at the 5¼ percent interest rate, plus discount points to be agreed upon as being reasonable.

Public Law 85–364, the present program, authorizes the VA Administrator to offer direct loans for sale to private lenders directly or through the voluntary home mortgage credit program. I call attention to the fact that where the Veterans' Administration makes a commitment to a builder under the direct-loan program, the builder must pay two points to the Administrator for the commitment. The law authorizes the Administrator to pass this two points on to a private lender who purchases the loan within 60 days from the date of its closing. I feel that this discount should be passed on to private lenders and to members of the voluntary home mortgage credit program. However, I do not feel that any additional discounts should be recognized for the placing of veterans' loans through the voluntary home mortgage credit program and its participating lenders.

Mr. Chairman, I have attempted to give both sides of the provisions contained in H.R. 2256. If this bill is enacted and the Administrator increases the interest rate to 5¼ percent, it will still fall short of supplying mortgage financing to the veterans in the rural areas, small cities, and towns of our country, but this bill will be a great help. It is important that we continue to provide these veterans with direct loan funds and I feel confident that my colleagues will support the bill now before us.

Mr. SANTANGELO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I yield.

Mr. SANTANGELO. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the chairman for bringing out this bill, but there are a few questions which arise in my mind. I recognize the gentleman is trying to protect the veteran not only so far as the veterans' deposits are concerned, but also to make sure the veteran gets a decent house. But, section 3 of your bill raises certain problems and questions which I would like to have answered. As I understand it, the direct loans bear an interest rate of 5¼ percent as do the FHA loans. I know that if you are going to require the builder to set aside the deposit that the veteran puts up for the purchase of his home, you will be preventing these builders from using the funds which they sorely need in order to complete the construction of the buildings. You do not make that provision with respect to the FHA loans. You are thereby giving the builder the urge to go to the FHA to obtain funds because then he can use the moneys that he gets as a deposit. Do you not think that by setting up this requirement, which is for the benefit of the veteran, that you are indirectly hurting the veteran because the builders will not build under these loans but will go to other people in order to get loans?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I would say to the gentleman that right next door to where he lives, last year veterans lost $160,000 because builders took the veterans' deposits and downpayments and used it and then went into bankruptcy.

Mr. SANTANGELO. That is true.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. If I may continue for a moment. In the code of ethics of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, and some 20 States, there is this same provision. We do not think it is an unfair provision.

Mr. SANTANGELO. If the rate of interest is going to be the same, and I say you are perfectly right, the veteran must be protected, but since the rate of interest chargeable to the veteran under these direct loans is the same as the FHA, then the builder is not going to go to the direct loans because he is the one who initiates the whole program and he is the one who brings the veteran in to make the application and, therefore, they are not going to the Veterans' Administration because you are denying the builder the right to use the funds, and if he does use them he is liable to a penalty of a prison sentence. I ask myself this question, and I ask it of the gentleman: Do you not think, sir, by this provision you will be denying the veteran an opportunity to get a house which he so sorely needs?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma, a former member of our committee and former chairman of the Subcommittee on Housing of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to express my appreciation to the gentleman from Texas for his forthright and, I think, concise statement as to just what the issues are that are involved in this bill. I particularly appreciated his accenting the fact that, if we do not provide direct loan funds and make them available, there are going to be many veterans in this country who do not have the availability of the GI loan program for their houses. To cite an illustration to the gentleman, our good friend, the gentleman from Indiana, told us a few moments ago that the year 1958 was the second highest year in building activities that we have ever had in the United States. In the year 1958, however, the records as revealed in the House Committee Print No. 1 will show that in 16 counties which I have the privilege of representing in this House there were 13 counties in which there is no record of a guaranteed loan being made in that record year. In 13 of those 16 counties the only loans that were made under this GI program to veterans were made under this direct-loan program. I think if the Members will look at this House committee print showing the breakdown for the different States on veterans' housing they will find in every State represented in this Chamber many counties in which there is absolutely no activity under the guaranteed-loan program. There are counties in my district in which I cannot remember a guaranteed loan ever having been made at any time. The direct loan is the only answer to these veterans' problems. I think the gentleman and his committee are to be commended for aggressively moving to give to the veterans in the small towns and in the rural areas a fair break under this program.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. This committee print is available to all the Members. It tells the number of guaranteed loans and the number of direct loans, and gives you a complete picture of the housing situation in each of your districts.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I yield.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Some discussion has been had about loans in metropolitan areas. There have been certain restrictions on loans in metropolitan areas. Does this bill in any manner change those restrictions?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. It does not.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Do I get your explanation right, that if an application is made by a veteran in a metropolitan area and private lenders are not able to supply the money or will not take the loan, is the Veterans' Administration in a metropolitan area then authorized to make a direct loan to that veteran?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. No. He will not do that, because he would send his direct-loan money to an area where only 2 percent of the veterans were able to obtain a loan. He will not send it into an area where over 35 percent of the veterans have obtained loans.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. But under this bill the Veterans' Administration can get $300 million, as I understand it. Is there any limitation on his putting it into a metropolitan area?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. There are over 45,000 veterans on the waiting list right now. This $300 million will take care of about 30,000 veterans. None of these veterans are in a metropolitan area.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. It is not the intent of this legislation to assist men in metropolitan areas?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. You are speaking of the direct-loan money?

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. It is to help the veterans in rural areas where it is impossible to get any kind of money.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. But the question I am trying to emphasize is that if a veteran makes an application in a metropolitan area, and none of the private lenders comes forward and takes the loan, is the Administrator authorized then to make the direct loan to the veterans in a metropolitan area?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. He is authorized to consider larger cities for direct loans but he will not do it.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Why?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Because it would take billions of dollars to do what the gentleman is talking about. We are trying to get only $300 million here.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Then if those veterans in a metropolitan area cannot get a loan locally they are out?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. That is exactly right.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I would like to congratulate the gentleman on the statement he has made and to congratulate his committee.

I want to thank the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs for giving us an opportunity to vote on a bill that will make more money available immediately for the direct loan program to our veterans to enable them to get necessary homes. I introduced H.R. 3039 during the early days of this session, and this bill would have provided an additional sum not in excess of $150 million for the direct loan program.

I know we are all aware of the splendid record that our veterans have made in repaying their loans. And I think this program is one of the safest and one of the most practical programs from an economic standpoint in which our Federal Government has participated.

When I was in my district, the Eighth District of Florida, this past fall, I do not know of any personal problem that came to my attention more than the problem of a veteran with a good job and reasonable financial security finding himself unable to get the necessary financing to build a home. I want to pay tribute to the loan guarantee officer in Florida, Mr. Tom C. David, who has done a magnificent job. I have talked with him many times over the telephone and have corresponded with him about this problem; and although he has been, and is today, as cooperative as humanly possible, the fact is, of course, there is just no money to lend.

As late as October 2 of this last fall, I wrote a letter to Mr. David regarding a direct loan application for one of my constituents, a Mr. Ernest B. Huggins, of Gainesville, Fla. Mr. Huggins is a splendid young businessman and there would have been no question of his receiving the loan if the money had been available. However, and I quote from a letter received from Mr. David on October 3, 1958, as follows:

> I have checked our records and find that there are approximately 380 veterans ahead of Mr. Huggins on our direct loan list. From the number of loans we are able to make each quarter I am sure we will not reach him within the next twelve months. We are receiving a large number of inquiries from veterans, but we have nearly 1,500 names on our list and at the present time we are making only 45 to 55 loans direct to veterans each quarter.

I am sure this same problem is being faced in all parts of America. It is particularly acute in my own district, since I represent an agricultural area composed of 15 counties of large geographical area, but of comparatively small population. Many of the counties of my district are not able to provide home loan financing through the conventional channels. Many of our veterans actually have no place else to go except to the direct loan program. This program has meant much to the rural areas of my district, and I know the same can be said of all other rural areas in our country.

I hope Congress will vote for an increase in the amount of money available for the direct loan program, and that many of our veterans who have waited so patiently will soon be able to see the construction of their homes actually started.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask the distinguished gentleman from Texas a couple of questions.

The Veterans' Administration advises me that the percentage of defaults on existing loans is greater in my State of West Virginia than in any other State. I can understand because more than 15 percent of the laboring force in my State is unemployed.

Does the gentleman think it would be advisable to set up some kind of a moratorium on these loans in any State where the percentage of unemployment is a certain amount? Should we not forestall the Veterans' Administration in taking action for a certain time in such situations? What is the gentleman's reaction?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I would say to the gentleman that I do not believe our committee has received a single complaint from a veteran. It is my understanding the Veterans' Administration has been very liberal in their foreclosure procedures.

Mr. BAILEY. The situation is getting worse in my State. I would like to have the chairman investigate and see what the situation is there.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. We will be very glad to look into it.

Mr. BAILEY. A great percentage of them are being threatened with the loss of the investment they already have in their homes.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MULTER. There has been much said up to this time about balancing the budget and not spending money and that this would be a good place to stop spending money.

The fact of the matter is that this is not a program for the expenditure of money; this is a loan program. Am I right?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MULTER. And is not this also the fact? That up to date the losses in this loan program have been eight-tenths of 1 percent; the losses have aggregated less than $2 million?

The profits earned by the interest from this program even at the low rates before we increase them have exceeded $45 million? So that there has been a net profit to the U.S. Government on this loan program at the low interest rates of more than $43 million

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. There will be about $26 million a year in interest coming in from now on.

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MONAGAN. It is true, is it not, that there are certain States, such as Connecticut, which is my State, in which there is no direct loan program?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. That is very true for the reason that to a great extent private loans have been available.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. Chairman, I have two amendments to offer to the bill which I do not like in its present form and I hope they will be adopted: One is that on the direct loans to veterans where the interest rate is raised from 4¾ to 5¼ the Administrator be authorized to take up the difference. The other is that on the guaranteed loans the Treasury pay the difference between the 4¾ and 5¼ percent interest rate.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that in many directions we are cutting the veterans unconscionably. We created this veterans' loan program to give housing to the veterans. I want to read a few of the advantages to veterans in making a comparison of GI loans and FHA loans.

There are certain definite advantages to GI loan financing over FHA financing from the viewpoint of the veteran borrower and these advantages are present even if the two loans bear an identical interest rate.

The obvious advantage to the GI loan is that it may be obtained for home, farm or business purposes whereas the FHA has no comparable farm and business loan program.

Other advantages of GI loan financing are as follows:

(a) The GI loan guarantee or insurance is furnished without charge to the borrower whereas FHA loan insurance is paid for by the borrower through a mortgage insurance premium payment of one-half of 1 percent per annum on the monthly declining balance of the loan.

(b) The VA valuation of the property fixes the maximum price which the veteran may pay for the property. The FHA valuation is used in determining only the maximum loan amount and the purchaser may pay in excess of the FHA appraisal if he choses to do so.

(c) The GI loan may be made for 100 percent of the approved purchase price. The FHA loan may be no more than 97 percent of the FHA valuation of the property in cases where the property is valued at no more than $13,500 and for a lesser percentage as the value of the property increases. Consequently, a downpayment requirement exists in FHA insurance authority which is not present in VA authority.

(d) The GI loan may be prepaid by the borrower at any time without premium or fee. A prepayment fee of 1 percent of the outstanding principal balance may be required if the borrower wants to pay off an FHA loan before maturity.

(e) The VA has authority to purchase defaulted GI loans where the holder refuses to extend indulgence in deserving cases, thereby affording the borrower a further opportunity to keep his home. The FHA has no comparable authority.

(f) The VA has more limitations on foreclosure action by lenders which are designed to protect the veteran's interest and prohibit precipitous action.

(g) The VA has a statutory directive to release an original veteran borrower from liability under certain conditions where the property is sold and a new purchaser assumes the mortgage indebtedness. The FHA has no such requirement.

Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, it may be that we find ourselves in this rather difficult situation because of the haste that all of us on the committee were guilty of in trying to get this bill to the floor without realizing, perhaps, that there could be so much controversy.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I think the gentleman should speak only for himself so far as haste is concerned.

Mr. AYRES. I tried to get the bill held over for 5 days. It was important that we vote the next day, we were told. It was important that we vote before 11 o'clock because I had a plane to catch on that day.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. The gentleman knows on the first day many of us wanted to vote, but in consideration of the gentleman we put it over until the next day.

Mr. AYRES. The gentleman did postpone it for 1 day. We were successful in getting the interest rate amendment adopted, increasing the rate from 4.75 percent to 5.25 percent. Then immediately on the adoption of that amendment the gentleman from Texas [Mr. TEAGUE] offered an amendment which doubled the ante, increasing the amount from $150 million to $300 million. I thought at the time we were being a little bit inconsistent in that approach because actually with the increase in the interest rate we will need far less money than we would need if we left the interest rate at the 4.75 percent.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Is it not true that if the increased interest rate provides sufficient money the Administrator does not have to draw any of this money?

Mr. AYRES. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. COLLIER. Would not the gentleman clarify the fact that this money is not returned to the Treasury but, rather, goes into a revolving fund? It does not go back into the Treasury at all.

Mr. AYRES. I will get to that in a moment.

Mr. Chairman, this direct loan program was first started in 1950 and in each session of the Congress since we have continued the program. In the 83d Congress, when the Republicans were in the majority we continued it. But this is the first time in the length of the program that we have come in and asked for additional money for the program over and above that which was previously allocated.

Why are we out of money today? They are out of money because in the GI program you have had a very unrealistic interest rate. The only money that has been available to the veteran has been through the direct loan program at 4.75 percent because the private lenders would not put out loans with that rate of interest. I have been advised by responsible people in the savings and loan field, the insurance companies, and the small savings and loan associations, that if we have a 5.25 percent interest rate at least half of the applications that are now pending or some 20,000 of the veterans who are trying to get a direct loan will be able to get a guaranteed loan.

We cannot follow what the gentleman from California was suggesting, that is, that we have a differential between the direct loan and a guaranteed loan, because we are in this difficulty today only because of the 4.75 percent money that was available to a certain group of veterans when there was no 4.75 percent money available to the veterans as a whole.

I know many of you are familiar with the VHMCP. That is the voluntary home mortgage credit plan.

Here is how that works. These people who have contacts with private lenders go out and try to place the loan before the Government makes the direct loan. The VHMCP has not been able to operate effectively during the last few months because of this unrealistic interest rate. Now, if we have 5¾ percent, then the VHMCP can do a good job, and there is no doubt in my mind that in most areas they will be able to place the loans. Now, it is true that there are some remote areas of our country where the figures show very few veterans have taken advantage of the program, but that does not necessarily mean that there are veterans there who have applied and been denied the opportunity. Now, this program has been in effect since 1950. Our veterans who served in World War II have been out of service on an average of 12 or 13 years and our Korean boys have been out on an average of 4 years, so actually the demand would be dropping off for direct loans if we had a realistic interest rate and permitted the VHMCP to operate in a businesslike manner. It is true that if this bill does not pass, there is not any money available at the present time. But, I think in view of what has happened and in view of what has transpired and now for the first time the Members are familiar with the necessity of having a realistic interest rate, it might be advisable to give the realistic interest an opportunity to function for 60 days. We will be in session quite awhile, I imagine, and then, as the gentleman from Virginia pointed out, and the gentleman from New York, it will perhaps straighten itself out once and for all, because our Veterans' Affairs Committee naturally has a lot of pride in the matter. Speaking for myself and not for the chairman, one of the reasons we were so anxious to get this bill out was to get one out before the other body did, because we would lose our jurisdiction eventually, probably, over this whole thing.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I think it important that the gentleman state when the eligibility for World War II veterans expires. If we do not do as the gentleman suggests, and wait to see if 5¾ percent will do the job, a great many veterans' eligibility would have expired. As the gentleman knows a veteran usually loses his chance to buy a particular piece of property, if he cannot get the loan in a reasonable time.

Mr. AYRES. It expires in 1960.

I will say to the gentleman from Texas we are all getting excited over the veterans; that there has been a great demand by veterans for housing. I have been very active in this sort of thing, yet I have to receive my first letter from a veteran since this has come up saying "Will you please help me get a direct loan?" There is not the demand that there has been. Most of the interest in this program stems from areas where they have not been able to get it because of an unrealistic interest rate.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. I would like to point out to the gentleman that in the eastern Ohio district that I represent, which is immediately adjacent to his territory, you cannot get a veterans loan now, and in my humble judgment you will not be able to get very many at the new interest rate. I happen to be a director of one bank, and we have made a great many loans at the old rate, as many as we could with the limited amount of capital that we had to operate with. But, there are other banks in that area who say that they will not make any veterans loans at any price, and certainly not at a price below 6 percent. There have been applications from veterans who cannot get a direct loan unless there is a direct loan program. I personally would rather see it handled through the banks, but I would not like to foreclose these people whose term expires in 1960 when they will not be able to get it, in my opinion.

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. EDMONDSON. According to the committee's own records there are 2,425 veterans on the waiting list for direct loans in the gentlemen's State of Ohio. Would that indicate to the gentleman a considerable number who are eager to get these loans and are in need of them?

Mr. AYRES. I think the gentleman will find in the final analysis that when these are checked there will be about a 20-percent dropoff in applications.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. Is it not true that the interest rate which was unrealistic added to the backlog, and now that the rate is realistic private capital will move in and these veterans will be able to get loans at the guaranteed program. In addition, there will be $200 million available for these loans in the fiscal year 1960, which, with the improved interest rate, ought to meet every available need.

Mr. AYRES. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. EDMONDSON. Is not that argument, that raising the interest rate is going to meet this situation, the same argument we have had every time this issue has come up, and have we not raised it several times intending to meet this problem in the rural areas, and we still have a continued demand in the rural areas?

Mr. AYRES. Congress has never voted except for a one-fourth percent increase. The Congress did not raise it to 4¾, the Administrator did that, and the loans increased, which the gentleman is familiar with because he was a member of the subcommittee at that time. I think the issue we are faced with here is this: Are you willing to vote for the increased interest rate and take a chance for the next 2 months and give it an opportunity to see if it is going to work, or do you want to open up $300 million immediately and make that available without giving the interest increase an opportunity to work in this field?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MITCHELL], a member of the committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, the enactment into law of H.R. 2256, which I trust will be overwhelmingly approved by this body, is vitally necessary if we intend to make the VA direct loan program a truly effective measure that will enable veterans in small towns and rural areas to buy homes.

I am particularly interested in the direct loan program. Early last year, shortly after joining the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I found that thousands of qualified veterans, who desired to do so, were unable to purchase homes because of the lack of proper financing. This was true not only in my area, the Seventh District of Georgia, but throughout the entire Nation. Sufficient financing was just not available to veterans living in small cities, towns, and rural areas of the country. Private loans were not available and, although the direct loan program was on the books, the VA had no funds to meet the need. To correct this situation, the Congress provided additional funds for the direct loan program in Public Law 85–364, which is known as the Emergency Housing Act of 1958. Public Law 85–364 was a good measure: good for the veterans, good for the builders, and good for business generally. It put veterans back into the market for homes; it provided jobs for laborers, bulldozer operators, brickmasons, carpenters, electricians, plumbers, painters, and a host of others. It provided orders for sand and cement, bricks and stone, lumber and steel. It sent small builders and their suppliers to their local banks for short-term loans for equipment, supplies, and increased production. It meant new business for practically everyone in all areas of the Nation. The unemployed went back to work and new orders poured into the factories. Virtually every community and every business, both large and small, were profitably affected as a result of the enactment of Public Law 85–364.

I might point out also, in case anyone is concerned about how much all this good work cost, that the VA direct loan aspect of the housing program did not cost the taxpayers 1 penny. To any Member who wants to help the veterans, particularly those living in rural areas; who wants to aid his community and serve his Nation, but who hesitates to be considered a spender, here is a golden opportunity. This program and this bill before us today is one that the most prudent protector of the public purse can support. It is one program on which all of us on both sides of the aisle can join forces and support in good conscience. This program is an investment in homeownership and good citizenship. It adds stability to the community, it adds new taxpayers and new income in the form of real estate tax to the small towns, where it is so greatly needed. It is an investment that pays a return—a return of unlimited intangible value and yet an actual return in dollars and cents to the U.S. Treasury. VA records on the program indicate a loss of only eight-tenths of 1 percent. With the interest rate permitted under this bill at 5¼ percent, the profit to the Treasury will be more than 5 percent, less cost of administration. Surely that leaves a substantial profit. This program makes no gifts, no grants-in-aid, no handouts to be repaid in counterpart funds, no iceboxes for Eskimos, no shower baths for cameldrivers, no air conditioning for the Arctic.

This bill provides for loans to qualified veterans, who must be approved by the VA, for the purchase of the building of a home, the soundness of which must also pass the inspection of and be approved by the VA. These are sound loans, secured loans to good risk veterans. These loans must be repaid in hard cash, with interest, in U.S. dollars.

The revival last year of the VA loan program was popular throughout the country. It was certainly popular with the veterans. When Public Law 85–364 went into effect, on April 1, 1958, there were 13,084 qualified veterans on the waiting list for direct VA loans. When veterans heard that new funds had been appropriated and the loan program extended for 2 years, many who had lost hope of ever securing a loan rushed to the nearest VA office to file an application. Although the loans were made as rapidly as possible to the approved veterans at the top of the waiting list, the requests for loans were so great that the waiting list increased to more than 40,000 in the first 8 months following the enactment of the bill.

The waiting list has been growing at the rate of approximately 2,000 veterans a month. In Georgia alone, more than 2,400 veterans are on the waiting list at this time. Additional funds are needed and needed now.

I feel that the situation in my State is more or less typical and if it had not been for the direct loan program many veterans, who were able to take advantage of the bill we passed last year, would not now be homeowners.

With the limited funds made available to the VA in Georgia, over 700 veterans were able to obtain homes since April 1, 1958. Of these loans, 173 were made to veterans in the Seventh District of Georgia, which I am privileged to represent.

Mr. Chairman, although H.R. 2256, now under consideration, requires an initial outlay of $300 million, or approximately 30,000 loans to qualified veterans, it will not cost the taxpayers of this country 1 red cent. The program is in the black. Through repayments, plus interest, it not only is making money for the U.S. Treasury, but it has been of tremendous help to the veterans and our Nation.

This great program provides homes for our veterans and, as I stated earlier, it has stimulated construction, provided employment, and increased business generally for our local merchants.

For years now, we have passed legislation and held out the possibilities of GI loans, but to far too many veterans we have offered only the shadow. H.R. 2256 provides the substance. I urge its approval.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard in the last few minutes the word "realistic" used many, many times. I think that under the leadership of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. TEAGUE] the bill as reported by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs is indeed a realistic bill in all respects. As reported it carries, what my colleague from Ohio calls, a realistic interest rate. However, it is one which personally does not appeal to me. I think 4¾ percent was realistic. As the gentleman says, however, this is 5¼, therefore it is realistic. It is further realistic in that it provides a realistic amount, $300 million. This amount will not wipe out this tremendous backlog of veterans who are entitled to these loans but will materially reduce the number who are on the waiting list.

I think you can say further that it is realistic in the fact that it does not cost the Government 1 cent in the long run. This is a bill which will in fact make the Government money.

As my friend from Ohio states, he has been assured by many private bankers that if this interest rate were raised to 5¼ percent there would be no need for this direct-loan provision. That being the case, there is no reason for us to fail to go ahead and provide this direct-loan money, because if private capital does what it says it will do, there will be no need for the Administrator to draw drafts on the Treasury. So that is no objection to this bill.

I think that certainly this bill is being realistic in that the Congress has provided entitlement to the veterans of our country for homebuilding, whether it be by guarantee or direct.

We have many in my area in the Seventh Congressional District of Georgia who are on the waiting list and who have not been able to finance the purchase of a home. Thirteen out of my 14 counties are eligible for direct loans. In 8 out of those 13, during this last year after the money was made available, not a single direct loan was made in those counties. I believe, although I am referring to my own home district, that 90 percent of you who live outside of metropolitan areas would find the same situation applies in your case likewise.

The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] a few moments ago stated what would happen to a veteran in a metropolitan area if he was unable to obtain a loan. Of course, veterans' loans both under direct loan as well as the guaranteed loan are based on whether the veteran is a good risk. In metropolitan areas, the law provides that in the event private capital in these metropolitan areas fails to provide funds, it is within the power of the administrator, if they are a good risk, in metropolitan areas to make the veterans eligible for direct loans.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman who now has the floor: How many counties in Georgia are eligible for these direct loans?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not have those figures for the State at large, but I may be able to get them in just a moment. I would say that we have 159 counties and something between 140 and 145 would be eligible for direct loans.

Mr. CONTE. How many counties in the State of Massachusetts would be eligible for these direct loans?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield to the chairman.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. None.

Mr. CONTE. I would like to point out to the gentleman from Georgia that this is typical of the Southern States and the agricultural States, coming to this Congress and asking for loans and grants continually at the expense of the taxpayers of the State of Massachusetts and the other States as well.

Mr. MITCHELL. In response to the gentleman from Massachusetts, the taxpayers of Massachusetts will not be financing the loans of the rural veterans of Georgia and of the remainder of this Nation. In fact, my friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts, should be advised that in the Congress and in the House at large, some 80 percent or over 80 percent of us represent what are considered to be rural districts insofar as this program is concerned. I am sure my good metropolitan friend would want the rural veteran who wore the uniform just as did the city veteran to receive exactly like treatment. That is all the rural veteran wants and that is what we want. Further, may I point out to the gentleman that apparently if none of the gentleman's district is eligible for direct loans, then private capital is making the money available under the guaranteed loan provision.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Our veterans are not receiving their loans and that is why I would like an amendment to go into the bill which would guarantee the difference between the 4¾ percent, what the veterans now pay on the guaranteed loans, up to 5¼ percent, and the money would come out of the Treasury of the United States. I would like to have loans in Massachusetts and in other urban and city areas and farm areas come under the direct loan plan of housing legislation. Years ago I tried to have all veterans' loans direct loans, but it did not happen.

Mr. MITCHELL. I know that the amendment referred to by the distinguished gentlewoman from Massachusetts is designed to speed up and increase this loan activity for all veterans wherever they may be.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, it is something of a farce to hold out the inducement of loans to veterans and not give them the houses.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR].

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I think there are a few additional things that ought to be said about this proposed legislation. Many points have already been developed. Certainly I assume that everyone in this House wants to be sure that adequate provision is made for proper housing for the veterans of this country.

First let us look at the direct loan program. Earlier in the debate a great deal was said about the danger of this type of legislation. Constitutional questions were presented. I think they were presented exceedingly well. I think there is a great deal of merit to the things that these gentlemen had to say, but in the case here it seems to me that the argument comes too late. This loan program has been in effect since 1950. There are now approximately $900 million in the direct loans. There is, under existing legislation, another $150 million which will be available at the first of the next fiscal year, making well over $1 billion already used or provided for this program.

I say I admire the gentlemen who made these arguments with respect to the question of constitutionality and procedure here, but it does appear to me they are being made at a somewhat late date in this instance if it is felt, as I assume it is, that we must make adequate provision for veterans through this direct loan program. Let us see how much money is already available.

I have just said that beginning next July 1 there will be $150 million additional available. In addition to this there will be over $40 million which represents payments of principal upon existing loans. Therefore, if we do nothing to the existing law in this respect, there will be available approximately $200 million as of next July 1. If we enact this legislation carrying provision for $300 million, that $300 million would be added to the approximately $200 million of which I have just spoken, making a total available of about $500 million, or a half billion dollars.

I am informed that an amendment will be offered which would have the effect of removing the $300 million from this bill. It seems to me that those who feel that some legislation in this respect is necessary and desirable, as I do, must then ask themselves whether we should support an amendment to strike $300 million out of this bill and leave $200 million available, or to vote for the bill as it now exists including the $300 million, making a total of almost $500 million available for this program.

I repeat, it seems to me that is the question which must be in the minds of those who favor a continuation of this program. I think in that connection it is worth repeating that the figures indicate this program has had a loss of less than 1 percent. It is, in fact, eight-tenths of 1 percent, which has been many times recouped by the payment of interest on the loans herein.

Now, Mr. Chairman, turning to the consideration of the guaranteed loan program, that part of the program which is designed to help those in the more populous or metropolitan areas——

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman leaves that subject will he yield for a question?

Mr. ADAIR. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. What does the gentleman think about the total $500 million loan fund? Can the money be used wisely?

Mr. ADAIR. In that respect, as the gentleman knows, if the money is available the Veterans Administrator does not need to use it; the decision is up to him. Heretofore it has been the practice that the Administrator would withdraw from the Treasury about $50 million per quarter for this purpose. At any time the Administrator sees that he does not need the money, he, of course, can simply decline or fail to withdraw the money.

But to answer the question which the gentleman has put, it seems to me that for the immediate future $200 million is quite an adequate sum for our needs; however, I confess that this is a question which leaves students of the matter in a very great amount of doubt. We do have 45,000 applications on file for assistance under this program. It is speculative to try to determine what amount would be needed to take care of these worthy families.

Mr. QUIGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAIR. I yield.

Mr. QUIGLEY. Assuming that the gentleman is correct that the $200 million would do the job, what harm is there in this bill's passing with the $500 million figure in it?

Mr. ADAIR. I would say to the gentleman that I did not say that $200 million would do the job.

Mr. QUIGLEY. But my question is based on the assumption that it would.

Mr. ADAIR. My own opinion on that point is that we are unable to tell. The gentleman, the chairman, and I think all members of the committee have, like myself, made a real effort to find the answer to the question, but we cannot know how much will be needed. There was question in the minds of some as to whether the full $300 million additional will be sufficient, but they reason that we should make available $500 million upon the assurance that the Administrator does not have to use it if he finds it is not necessary. It seems to me that is the best answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. QUIGLEY. But is it not a fact that we do not know for certain whether the $200 million would do the job or whether even the $300 million would do it?

Mr. ADAIR. It is a fact, and neither do we know whether the $500 milllion will do it.

Mr. QUIGLEY. And the question that bothers me with all this uncertainty is why we are bleeeding and dying here over a figure which at best may be academic.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAIR. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. But the $300 million is an obligation upon the United States Treasury, is it not?

Mr. ADAIR. It is an obligation on the Treasury.

Mr. QUIGLEY. It is an obligation, but it does not have to be; in other words, the Administrator does not have to use any of it.

Mr. ADAIR. I think the Members understand that situation, that he does not have to use it.

Now, turning to the guaranteed loan portion of this bill: This bill does propose an increase in interest rates of one-half of 1 percent. There may be some who will ask why should we impose this additional burden upon the veterans? Why should we not leave the interest rate where it is? Is not this an unfair thing to do to the veterans?

Those questions I think have been answered by previous speakers who have pointed out that our experience is that the 4¾ percent simply does not produce the loans. I am interested, and the Members of this House are interested, in seeing to it that we do have loans for this purpose. We have been assured that the increased interest rate will produce loans, will relieve the situation in our metropolitan areas. If that is true, then the question is, Do we want a veteran to have a house even though he must pay slightly more interest? I think if the test is whether or not he gets the house, we would say to ourselves that most veterans would be willing to pay the slight increase in interest to provide themselves a home.

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAIR. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. HALEY. The gentleman is well aware of the fact that the 5.25 percent figure is not an absolute figure. It is more or less a flexible figure?

Mr. ADAIR. I am glad the gentleman brings that point out. This again, may be fixed at the option and at the discretion of the Administrator. This is not a mandatory figure; it is a ceiling. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAIR. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VANIK. In the gentleman's statement he pointed out the increase in the interest rate. That is, I presume, based upon the FHA experience?

Mr. ADAIR. Principally.

Mr. VANIK. Is it not true that the loans have not increased in some respects because of the Federal Reserve policies that came into play last year, that the Federal Reserve discount policy has more to do with the availability of mortgage money than the fluctuations that we might see in the interest rate?

Mr. ADAIR. That is a question upon which the Members would certainly differ. I know the view enunciated by the gentleman is held by some. Others hold a contrary view. My own thinking is that lending institutions can turn to other programs, such as FHA, and get a better rate of interest, which has been the principal reason that we have not had enough money available in many areas for guaranteed loans.

Mr. VANIK. In the committee hearings was there any discussion relative to the effect of the Federal Reserve discount policies as distinguished between the effect of the interest rate rise and the productivity of available money for loans?

Mr. ADAIR. My recollection of the hearings leads me to say there was very little, if any, discussion on that point. I do not recall any discussion upon it.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAIR. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is it not very much better for the veteran to seek to borrow from the Veterans' Administration than it is from the FHA?

Mr. ADAIR. I think it is better for the veterans to have either a direct or a guaranteed loan. They are somewhat better off in either of those instances than to have an FHA loan. We have tried to give the veterans the benefit of these programs.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. It is very hard. There are practically no loans in the urban areas, and they do not benefit from direct loans at the present time.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAIR. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. AYRES. Is it not true that we have found that the big advantage of the GI program is in the small downpayment and the small monthly payments?

Mr. ADAIR. I agree with the gentleman. I think the veterans are mostly concerned with those items, the small downpayment and the small monthly payments. In this way many are able to purchase homes who would not otherwise be able to do so.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that we do need legislation on this subject of veterans' housing at the present time.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SISK].

Mr. SISK. Mr. Chairman, at this time I wish to commend the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs and the members of that committee for their expeditious action in bringing this bill to the floor at this time. Certainly my previous experience with that very fine group over some 4 years has led me to understand their deep consideration and concern for the veterans, and particularly for adequate housing for our veterans across this Nation.

I would like to call your attention to the charge or, at any rate, the statement that has been made to the effect that the increase in interest rates will solve the situation and that there will no longer be any need for direct loan money. Now, the veterans loan program, that is, the guaranteed loan program, is 15 years old, I believe, going back to the initial act. The direct loan program is some 8 or 9 years old. And, in spite of the 15 years of its existence, we still have large areas of our country where only a small percentage of veterans have been able to secure home loans. The figure shows a great percentage of veterans without homes. For example, in my own State of California, almost half of the counties in that State are in that category. We take some 25 counties and check the percentage of veterans that have secured a loan of any kind, either insured or direct, we find them under 15 percent of the total veterans. In my own district I have one county which is considered to be an urban type of area where something over 30 percent of the veterans have acquired loans over the period of 15 years, and that same thing is true of many of our metropolitan counties. But, the facts are that in spite of what I understand to be true, that loans over a major part of this time were selling at or near par, these great rural areas were not able to secure loans, and the veterans in those areas, have been unable to secure homes. It would seem to me that that in itself would indicate that the rate of interest set by the VA or the Congress is not the answer to the percent, or whatever it may be, because be at 3 percent, 4 percent, 5 percent, 6 percent, or whatever it may be, because as I say, the history of the program over the major portion of the period of time of its existence indicates that the rate of interest generally was acceptable. I readily admit that within the past 2 years the rate has not been sufficient because of the fact that we have seen these great discounts which were necessary to get the money, to make it available. But, the point that I am making is that the interest rate will not solve and will not make available money for homes for this great mass of our veterans across the Nation in the rural areas.

I further would like to comment on one particular charge which was made a little bit ago that this represented some sort of a subsidy; particularly it represented a subsidy for the South. Well, certainly nothing in the factual history or background of this legislation or any other similar legislation represents any kind of a subsidy to any section of this country. In the first place, this type of a program is not a subsidy. Every record that we have regarding the VA loans, either insured or direct, represents an outstanding record of repayment, and the facts as have already been brought out here today indicate that actually the Government has made a profit on the direct loan program, so that any charge of subsidy for anyone, and particularly any section of our country, is completely in error.

Let us get on with the job and pass this bill just as the committee brought it to us. It is a good bill and is needed by our veterans.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am strongly in support of this legislation. I congratulate the committee on bringing it out. It is long overdue.

Anyone who lives in a rural area in this country knows that veterans outside the metropolitan centers have not received fair treatment under the GI home loan program. I am sure no one intended to discriminate against these veterans but discrimination has been the result.

In 14 of the 16 counties in my district in Missouri which are eligible for direct loans there were no GI loans whatsoever made in the last 6 months of 1958. In Greene County, there were two made, and in Douglas County one. What kind of a program is this?

Scarcely a week passes that I do not get a letter from same irate veteran—and I do not blame him for being irate—who has applied and qualified for a GI loan, yet he cannot get one, because there is no money.

Anyone in a rural area, especially in my section, who has gone to a bank or savings loan association recently trying to get a GI loan, is told to forget it. These money lending people are patriotic, they want to help the veterans, but they are in business to make money, just as everybody else in business, and they simply feel they cannot take on very many GI loans, or they will jeopardize their profits. And let us not kid ourselves about raising this interest rate to 5¼ percent.

In my area, this is not going to solve the problem, either, for this very simple reason: The going rate of interest on a 20-year home loan from a savings and loan association in my district right now is about 6 percent. If you are lucky you can get it for 5¾ percent. How many of these people are going to lend money for 30 years to a veteran or anybody else at 5¼ percent if they can get 6 percent? It is a matter of simple commonsense arithmetic.

What we must have in these areas is direct-loan money. I got a letter just yesterday from a very fine banker in my district who said that he was afraid of direct veterans housing loans originally, thought it would be unfair competition for private lending institutions, but after living with it for awhile, he feels that it is about the only way to handle the GI home loan program.

He says the private firms are not in a position to handle GI loans.

If the GI housing loan program is worth while, if the Government was helping veterans to get some kind of housing at some sort of a special interest rate and longer term repayment as delayed compensation for their service to their country, it is not fair for GI loans to be readily available in the cities and not available at all in rural areas.

If the direct-loan program is not expanded, veterans in areas like southwest Missouri do not have a chance of getting a GI home loan this year. Our veterans will continue to read advertisements in the big city newspaper begging veterans to come in and take advantage of their GI loan qualifications. Our veterans will watch the big city boys exercise their GI benefits, but our veterans will be shut out.

I hate to see the Government in the lending business just as much as the next man. My philosophy is that money lending should be handled by private lending firms.

But if the Government has decided that veterans are entitled to special home loans, if private channels cannot afford to make such loans, then the Government has to fulfill its promise. Not because Government will do it better or even do it as well, but because no one else will do it at all.

Also, I intend to support the amendment that is going to be offered by the gentleman from California, if it involves what I think it will. The interest rate on the direct loan funds should not be 5¼ percent. It is not good to establish the precedent of Government profiteering on a Government promise to its veterans.

Direct loans to veterans are profitable to the Government. Uncle Sam has shown a profit of more than $40 million on direct loans already made. Losses have been less than $2 million total.

Unless there is some compelling reason that I am overlooking, I see no reason to make the direct loans so much more profitable by raising interest rates to 5¼ percent on money the Government gets for 3¾ percent.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That subsection (a) of section 1823 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by inserting immediately after the second sentence the following new sentence: "In addition to the sums authorized in this subsection, the Secretary of the Treasury shall also advance to the Administrator such additional sums, not in excess of $150,000,000, as the Administrator may request, and the sums so advanced shall be made available without regard to any limitation contained in this subsection with respect to the amount which may be advanced in any one quarter annual period."

SEC. 2. (a) Paragraph (1) of subsection (c) of section 1803 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by striking out ", but the rate of interest so prescribed by the Administrator shall not exceed at any time the rate of interest (exclusive of premium charges for insurance, and service charges if any), established by the Federal Housing Commissioner under section 203 (b) (5) of the National Housing Act, less one-half of 1 per centum per annum."

(b) Subsection (f) of section 1802 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by inserting immediately before the period at the end of the first sentence the following: ", or by any mortgagee designated and approved by any department, agency, or instrumentality of the United States as a certified agent, and which is acceptable to the Administrator".

SEC. 3. (a) Subchapter III of chapter 37 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by inserting immediately after section 1824 thereof the following new section:

"§ 1825. Deposit of downpayments in trust accounts

"(a) Where the Administrator has made a determination of reasonable value of housing units in a project involving five or more of such units which are proposed to be constructed or are newly constructed and previously unoccupied, and a veteran has made a deposit or downpayment on the purchase price of any such unit for the purpose of purchasing such unit with a loan guaranteed, insured, or made under this title, it shall be unlawful for the seller to fail to deposit such deposit or downpayment in a special trust account before the close of the next business day, in order to safeguard such deposit or downpayment from the claims of creditors of the seller. Where such deposit or downpayment has been deposited in a special trust account, it shall be unlawful for such deposit or downpayment to be disposed of in any manner except (1) being credited to the veteran purchaser at closing settlement, or (2) if the transaction is not consummated, being disposed of in accordance with the terms of the contract between the parties or returned to the veteran. Nothing in this section shall prevent the application of a deposit or downpayment to the cost of land or construction where a veteran purchaser has contracted for the construction of residential property which is to be financed with the assistance of a construction loan to be obtained under the provisions of this title.

"(b) Whoever violates subsection (a) of this section shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both."

(b) The analysis of chapter 37 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by adding at the foot thereof the following new item:

"1825. Deposit of downpayments in trust accounts."

SEC. 4. (a) Subsection (b) of section 1804 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The Administrator may also refuse to appraise any dwelling or housing project owned, sponsored, or to be constructed by any person refused the benefits of participation under titles I, II, VI, VII, VIII, or IX of the National Housing Act pursuant to a determination of the Federal Housing Commissioner under section 512 of that Act."

(b) Subsection (d) of section 1804 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The Administrator may also refuse either temporarily or permanently to guarantee or insure any loans made by a lender or holder refused the benefits of participation under titles I, II, VI, VII, VIII, or IX of the National Housing Act pursuant to a determination of the Federal Housing Commissioner under section 512 of that Act."

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas (during the reading of the bill). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as read and be open for amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment on page 1, line 8, strike out "$150,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$300,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment on page 2, line 5, after "amended" insert "(1)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment on page 2, line 11, immediately before the period insert the following: "; and (2) by striking out '4¾ per centum per annum' and inserting in lieu thereof '5¼ per centum per annum'."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment on page 2, line 14, strike out "(f)" and insert in lieu thereof "(d)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment on page 3, line 9, after "account" strike out "before the close of the next business day."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TEAGUE of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TEAGUE of California: On page 1, strike out line 3 and all that follows down through line 3 on page 2, and renumber the following sections accordingly.

Mr. TEAGUE of California. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is a very simple one, but it is designed to accomplish a very important purpose. That purpose has been discussed very fully here this afternoon. I will not dwell on it at any great length. This amendment would remove the $300 million which is currently in the bill.

I would like to state I have a sincere and great respect for my namesake, Cousin OLIN TEAGUE of Texas, the chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee. Ordinarily, I follow his leadership in the Committee on Veterans' Affairs. This is one instance in which I cannot.

It seems to me we are not involved here in a matter of partisan politics. I am sure there are Members on both sides of the aisle who have the view that I hold, mainly, that this $300 million is simply not necessary in this bill and should be removed.

Furthermore, in my view this is not in any sense an antiveteran point of view. I am a veteran myself and this is my fourth year on the Veterans' Affairs Committee. After all, I should like to remind the Members that we will have on next July 1 almost $200 million available for this fund. We will be in session for many months between now and July 1. If the new realistic interest rate program on guaranteed loans does not work out, as most of us think it will, there will still be time then to come back and appropriate the necessary funds for the direct program. I would also like to state I feel strongly that those of us who vote to remove the $300 million are not in any way casting reflections upon either the direct or guaranteed portion of the veterans loan program.

It is our hope it will be continued. It is simply a matter of judgment in which some members of our committee feel that the $300 million simply is not necessary and we do not need to start right off in this session by unbalancing the budget to that extent. After all, I should like to remind my fellow Members that veterans are also taxpayers. They have to pay taxes and they should be just as interested as we are, and I know they are, in a balanced budget and in fighting inflation.

I hope you will agree with me that this amendment should be carried.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEAGUE of California. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. As I listened to the debate today, it was suggested by the proponents of this measure, if I understood them correctly, that it might well come to pass in the future, with this increase in the interest rate, that it will serve to bring into play funds from other sources and will eliminate the use of any of this $300 million. That is offered as an argument as to why it is all right to put in the $300 million. But it seems to me the argument on the other side is stronger. In other words, as the gentleman well pointed out, if it does happen that the $300 million is not necessary, then why put $300 million in the bill now? I agree with the gentleman this program cannot be damaged one bit by cutting out the $300 million. Let us see what the experience will be under this increased interest rate. Then if, as the gentleman says, there is any need for additional money later on we can take care of that situation. But this country is looking to Congress to maintain some degree of fiscal responsibility. Why have it appear on the record that we have added $300 million to the President's budget, because at this juncture it is just exactly that.

May I say I support the gentleman's amendment. And if the amendment is not adopted, then I shall vote against the bill, and I trust my colleagues will do likewise.

Mr. TEAGUE of California. I thank the gentleman for his valuable support.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

This amendment has been argued all afternoon. What it means is that the veterans in the rural areas will not be able to get a house this next year. The Veterans' Administration told us there are 45,000 veterans on the waiting list right now. I know that this interest increase will not take care of all these veterans. We should have some money in the direct loan fund.

I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. TEAGUE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. AYRES) there were—ayes 55, noes 90.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, on this vote I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. TEAGUE of California and Mr. TEAGUE of Texas.

The Committee again divided and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 83, noes 123.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROOSEVELT: On page 2, immediately below line 20, insert the following: "(c) Paragraph (1) of subsection (d) of section 1811 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by striking out 'the rate authorized for guaranteed home loans' and inserting in lieu thereof '4¾ per centum per annum'."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. That language has already been amended by vote of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may say to the gentleman from New York that that section of the bill has not been amended.

Mr. TABER. It was amended when the committee amendment was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, of course, a different part of the bill than the committee amendment that was adopted.

Mr. TABER. This amendment is to lines 11, 12, and 13, on the face of the bill, and an amendment was inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may say to the gentleman from New York that the amendment may be inconsistent with that language. The Chair does not rule on that. This amendment is in order, however.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply points out that if private money at 5¼ percent does not come forth, and it becomes necessary then for the Treasury to authorize direct loans, these direct loans to the veterans shall remain at the interest rate of 4¾ percent. Under existing law, the Administrator would have the authority to increase the rate on direct loans to 5¼ percent, if he so wanted. My amendment would keep it at 4¾ percent.

The basic justice of my amendment is simply that where the Government must make loans to veterans because private industry has not come forward the Government should not profiteer on the veterans. It is admitted already that the present 4¾ percent is actually making money for the Treasury, and, therefore, this increased percentage is not necessary to keep the program profitable. My amendment would not add to the expense of the Government in any way whatsoever.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. There has been a good deal of talk here about the builders. If the builders do not come into the direct program, then the builders will not get more money. It seems to me only just to keep it at the 4¾ percent for the direct loans, as it is today. I do not know why that went into our bill, unless they want to punish the direct-loan people.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I thank the distinguished gentlewoman. Of course, I agree with her.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MULTER. I am in complete agreement with what the gentleman has said and also with what the gentlewoman from Massachusetts has said. If we increase the interest rate by this one-half of 1 percent on direct loans, it merely means that much additional profit on the program for the United States Government. No builder can get any part of it, no lending agency can get any part of it, no bank can get any part of it. It will mean that the veterans will have to pay the additional one-half percent which is that much more profit for the Government. I am sure we do not want the Government to make any additional profit on this program at the expense of the veterans.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ADAIR. Is it not true that if the amendment is adopted one group of veterans would be paying one-half percent more interest than another group?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. That is correct, but it would only be because of the fact that private funds were not forthcoming. I sincerely do regret that we have to charge that extra one-half percent interest in order to attract these private loans, but if they are not forthcoming then I think the important precept is to make sure we do not allow profiteering on Government funds advanced to veterans.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I yield.

Mr. ADAIR. Does it not appeal to the gentleman that this is a serious objection? We have in these two programs through the years kept the interest rate the same. If we begin to discriminate in favor of one group, then, of course, all who can will try to resort to that type of loan, and those who cannot are thereby penalized.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I would simply say to the gentleman that then it is up to the private bankers of America. If they want to make money available to the veterans, they have the opportunity in this bill, but if they fail and they come back and make the Treasury and the Government of the United States do it, then I say we must not profiteer on those veterans.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHLEY. I think it might be pointed out that if this charge of potential discrimination is valid, then we already have discrimination, as the interest rate has gone from 4 percent, as originally enacted, up to the present 4¾, and it will perhaps go up again.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I think the gentleman's point is well taken. There are already several rates and there will be another rate if this bill is adopted; therefore it does not seem to me that this is any more discriminatory than it is now to increase the rate against those who are paying the lesser rate at the present time. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think there is no question but that there is merit to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California. We have had a difficult time with this housing bill. There has been a lot of give and take on both sides, and I hope that this bill will pass and become law. I would say to the gentleman from California that it is an important question, and that if he would introduce a bill to accomplish the same purpose, that I will give him a hearing before the committee as quickly as we get an opportunity. But, I hope he will not insist on his amendment to the bill today.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I will say to the gentleman that I would, of course, normally be delighted to do so, but with the heavy schedule I am afraid I will never get back into the arena, and in deference to the people who have asked me to come forward with this program, I think there would be objection.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ROOSEVELT) there were—ayes 67, noes 129.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SAYLOR of Pennsylvania: On page 4, after line 23, insert:

"SEC. 5. Section 1823(a) of title 38, United States Code, is hereby amended by (1) striking from the second sentence thereof ', less that amount which has been returned to the revolving fund during the preceding quarter annual period from the sale of loans pursuant to section 1811(g) of this title,' and (2) inserting between the third and fourth sentences a new sentence to read as follows:

"Notwithstanding such allocation of direct loan funds as may be prescribed by the Administrator, amounts equivalent to the amounts received by the Administrator in any quarter annual period from the sale of loans pursuant to section 1811(g) shall in addition be allocated, during the quarter next succeeding such sale, to the respective regional offices where the loans were sold for the purpose of making additional loans under section 1811 of this title."

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is very simple. At the present time the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs allocates each regional office four times a year sums of money to be used for the direct-loan program. From time to time some of those mortgages are sold. The money that is received from the sale of those mortgages then goes back to the Veterans' Administration and is redistributed from the central office proportionately to all the district offices, not in the area where the mortgages were originally placed, only a small portion of it goes back into that area.

The purpose of this amendment is to see to it that if in any area you have people in the Veterans' Administration who have enough energy to get out and sell their mortgages they will have the money realized from the sale of their mortgages to reinvest with veterans' mortgages in the same area. That is the purpose of the amendment. It was rather technical to have it drafted, and I can say to the members of this committee that had the staff had the amendment ready it would have been adopted by the committee at its regular meeting.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAYLOR. I am happy to yield to the distinguished lady from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I understand the Veterans' Administration would be very glad to have this amendment adopted.

Mr. SAYLOR. The Veterans' Administration would be very delighted to have this amendment adopted.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I have no objection to the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MULTER, of New York: On page 2, after line 3, insert a new section, to read as follows:

SEC. 2. Strike out all of subdivision (a) of section 1811 and all of the first sentence of subdivision (b) of section 1811 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) Wherever the Administrator finds that private capital is not generally available in any area for the financing of loans guaranteed under section 1810 of this title, he may designate such area as a housing credit shortage area."

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT] had prevailed to limit the interest rate as sought in his amendment, I would then have offered another amendment so as to limit the interest rate on direct loans to the same interest rate payable on guaranteed loans. That would have prevented any increase of the interest rate on GI loans. Since a majority of this committee has determined by its last vote to increase the interest rate, I am not offering any other amendment in that respect.

This amendment, however, will broaden the coverage of the direct-loan program. I would like to call your attention to the fact that section 1811, entitled "Direct Loans to Veterans," presently provides that these direct loans are available only when guaranteed loans are not available. When there is no private financing or private capital available from lending institutions, then the direct-loan program comes into play, and then only in parts of the country, to wit—and I quote from the law—"rural areas or in small cities and towns not near large metropolitan areas." My amendment seeks to change that language so that it will read, "Whenever the Administrator finds that private capital is not generally available in any area for the financing of loans guaranteed under section 1810 of this title, he shall designate such area as a 'housing credit shortage area.'"

In other words, as long as there are guaranteed loans available to the veterans, they cannot get direct loans. But I say in my amendment and my amendment seeks to provide that no matter where a veteran may be, whether he is near a large metropolitan area or in a rural area or in a small city or town, if there are no guaranteed mortgages available to him and if no private capital is available, he should have the right to get a direct loan, provided that the Administrator finds that he is in a "housing credit shortage area." This will then put veterans across the country on the same basis, so that if the veteran cannot get a private loan he can get a direct loan. I urge that the law be so modified.

Mr. BUDGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MULTER. I yield.

Mr. BUDGE. If I understand the purpose of this legislation, as it came from the committee, it is to provide the direct loans in areas where historically we have found that private capital is not available. Is it the purpose of the gentleman's amendment to make this program apply 100 percent across the Nation so that we do not have any specific areas pinpointed?

Mr. MULTER. No, sir; that is not the purpose of my amendment at all. My amendment simply seeks to put the veterans across the country who cannot get private loans on the same basis. I assure you it will not apply in places like the city of New York. It will apply in other places. I think the gentleman from Ohio is asking me to yield so that he can indicate that it applies in his part of his State. My amendment simply gives the Administrator the right, first, to determine which are housing credit shortage areas and, secondly, if there is a veteran in that area who cannot get a private loan to permit him to apply for and get a direct loan.

Mr. BUDGE. If the gentleman will yield for a further question, if the Administrator should find that the metropolitan area of New York City was in need of financial services for this purpose, could he not under the gentleman's amendment, apply this legislation to the metropolitan area of your city?

Mr. MULTER. Theoretically, the answer, of course, is that he could, but if he did I am sure he would be fired by whoever his superior happened to be.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MULTER. I yield.

Mr. VANIK. I agree, and I hope that the gentleman's amendment will be favorably considered by the House. There are cities throughout this country that fall without this category as defined in the law, where the banking practice in the community has precluded any GI loan. I think this provision ought to be in the law so that in such communities where banking practices preclude GI loans, a veteran may have the relief that this section affords. Would the sponsor of this amendment change the language from mandatory to permissive? Then that would leave it permissive with the administration to determine.

Mr. MULTER. That is the way the law is interpreted today. But I will not quibble about words. If you prefer the word "may" to "shall", I agree to the change. It is being interpreted today as permissive and not mandatory. There is no review of the Administrator's finding except the President has the power to discharge an administrator who does not properly perform his duties.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULTER] has expired.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. It was suggested to the gentleman from New York that he change the word "shall" to "may."

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment at the desk be modified to change the word "shall" to "may."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment as modified.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the amendment, it will not change the loan in any form. I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULTER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I asked for this time not for the purpose of offering an amendment. During general debate I raised the same question about the serious situation that has arisen as to the defaults on these direct loans to veterans.

While general debate was going on I contacted the Veterans Administration and I have some data that I think should go into the RECORD at this point.

In my State of West Virginia, which has the largest percentage of unemployment of any State in the Union, the defaults are 9.64 percent of the total number of loans. The average for the Nation is 4.46 percent. In my State of West Virginia there has been a total of 4,237 loans made. Only 33 of those have been foreclosed, which is less than 1 percent. There were 22,064 guaranteed loans for homes, farms, and business. Here is what has happened. The home loans, foreclosed on 306 out of a total of 21,023. Farm loans, 46 foreclosed out of a total of 412. Business loans, 64 foreclosed out of a total of 629. I think particularly of the situation in those States—there are eight of them—that are losing population where the economy is really bad.

I am suggesting that it is serious enough that the chairman of the committee ought to inquire into the rate of defaults in the several States with the idea that the committee perhaps would want to consider legislation as the matter gets more serious.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. The committee will be glad to do that, I may say to the gentleman.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts: Page 2, line 13, immediately before the period, insert the following: "and (3) by adding at the end thereof a new sentence to read as follows: 'In every case in which a loan is guaranteed under section 1810 and the interest rate is more than 4¾ per centum per annum, the Administrator is authorized to pay out of appropriations directly to the veteran, during the period the property is owned and occupied by the veteran as his home, and at such intervals as he may prescribe by regulations, an amount representing the difference between the interest paid by the veteran on the loan at the rate actually charged, not exceeding the maximum rate chargeable hereunder at the time the loan was made, and the amount of interest that would have been paid had the rate been set at 4¾ per centum per annum.' "

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to press for the passage of my amendment because I think with the present temper of the Committee—and I do not mean this in any disagreeable way, but I think with the present feeling of the House it would not pass. I have faith that it will be passed in the Senate and that they also will take care of the direct loan provision under the same conditions. So I will wait, hoping that the Senate will pass it. I know that this is not an easy bill to evaluate but a confusing one.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentlewoman from Massachusetts withdraw her amendment?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I withdraw the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Chairman, as one who has labored over a long period of time, even since before I became a Member of this great representative Chamber, for the cause of the veteran and his dependents in all its humane and patriotic ramifications, I am always eager to embrace the opportunity to support changes in basic laws which I deem to extend and perfect existing programs.

The pending bill is unquestionably intended to correct certain deficiencies, defects, and shortcomings which have developed in the veterans' housing program.

Forty-five thousand veterans are waiting for direct loans. Their applications have been pending for some time. But no funds are or have been available. This bill will correct this situation and provide more funds for direct loans. I hope it will mean the early end to piled-up applications of veterans waiting to purchase homes.

This measure also would increase the interest rate on the loans from 4¾ percent to 5¼ percent with the hope that higher interest rates will increase the supply of money available for veterans' home loans. I have distinct misgivings about this provision. It is definitely inflationary. It puts larger burdens on borrowing veterans. In the long run this would entail very substantial extra cost to the veterans.

It seems to me that some way could be found to keep veterans' loan interest rates at a reasonable level, and I hope the administration will study this important question and grapple with inflationary factors and interest charges.

The original GI bill was the charter of veterans' rights, entitlements, and benefits. It has worked well. It has been very helpful to millions of veterans and their families. Let us always do our best to preserve its essential principles and policies and work to improve and streamline them whenever the demands of change and progress require it.

Mr. ROBISON. Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote "No" on final passage of H.R. 2256 purely as a protest against what I feel is an unwarranted, and will prove to be an unnecessary, obligation of Federal funds that will have the effect, at least on paper, of throwing any hopes for the realization of a balanced budget out the window. I think it would be a sad commentary on the almost total disregard this Congress has for the principle of fiscal responsibility that we should so act on this, our first record vote of this session.

For the record, I wish to state that I am in full accord and sympathy with that portion of this bill that brings the interest rate allowable on veterans' home loans up to a much more realistic figure. As a former director of a Federal Savings and Loan Association, with 12 years of experience with this problem, I am convinced that such a change in allowable interest rates will bring forth an immediate sufficient supply of private lending moneys, and that this will have the effect of removing from the list of those veterans who are now waiting for direct loans all except those whose applications have been refused by lending institutions by reason of true geographic limitations.

Should, however, this prove to be an inaccurate forecast, there is ample time for this Congress to consider, by the proper method of appropriation instead of this back-door approach to the Treasury, the need for additional direct loan funds over and above the close to $200 million which now is, or will shortly be, made available for the continuance of this essential part of the veterans' home loan program.

As a veteran of World War II, with a G.I. mortgage now covering my own home, I would most certainly do nothing to curtail this program in any way, but I think we should all pause long enough to remember that veterans are also taxpayers and subject, as all our citizens are, to the hidden tax implicit in the inflation that is bred and flourishes in continuous Federal deficit financing.

Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think the Veterans' Affairs Committee is to be congratulated on the expeditious manner in which they have considered and approved H.R. 2256.

The additional $300 million authorized by this legislation is essential if the veterans' direct loan program is to function successfully. The 43,187 veterans on the direct loan waiting list as of November 1, 1958, provide sufficient testimony to the inadequacy of previous appropriations for this program. When we recall that many other interested veterans have not applied because of the frustratingly long waiting list, we get some inkling of the interest in, and need for, this program.

The direct loan program has done much to remedy the lack of home financing for veterans living in rural areas and in small towns and cities. Particularly in regions such as Oregon's Second Congressional District, which I represent, the program has made home ownership possible. Where the guaranteed home loan program has failed to achieve the goals set forth in the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, the direct loan program has proved successful. I think it is worthy of expansion and consequently I am completely in favor of this additional $300 million authorization.

Mr. Chairman, I am disappointed, however, that the Committee has considered it necessary to raise the interest rates on direct loans from 4¾ to 5¼ percent. In my opinion, this is an unjustified increase and one that is eminently unfair to those veterans covered by the program.

Mr. Chairman, a one-half of 1 percent increase in interest rates may initially seem insignificant. But when we translate that one-half percent into the additional money it will cost the average veteran, we soon find that it is indeed a substantial added burden. Assuming a 30-year loan, we find that a veteran who wishes to buy a $10,000 home will have to pay an extra $1,110 because of this one-half percent increase. In the case of a $12,000 home, this added payment jumps to $1,350. This data, plus the fact that many rural homes must be financed over a 40-year period with even higher additional payments, speaks for itself.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to support H.R. 2256 as I believe it is absolutely essential to authorize additional funds for the veterans' direct loan program. However, I believe it would be a much better bill with the adoption of the Roosevelt amendment which would maintain the present interest rate of 4¾ percent.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against the proposal in this bill to provide $300 million for loans to veterans of rural areas to buy homes.

It is not a bad bill but there are other things that veterans need more desperately than loans to buy homes in rural areas. Veterans are growing older and require more and better hospital and medical care. Also non-service disabled and unemployable veterans should have a pension increase because they have not had one in 5 years despite the fact that the cost of living has gone up for them as well as for everyone else.

If this $300 million is provided for Federal grants to buy homes it means that the budget will be further out of balance. The more the budget is out of balance the longer it will be before funds will be made available for modern VA hospitals and to provide the nonservice-connected disabled and unemployable veteran a deserved increase in his pension.

There is said to be 45,000 veteran requests on file for direct Federal home loans. The records of the Veterans Administration show that of these 45,000 veteran requests for direct loans for the purchase of homes only 521 are on file from the State of Washington.

As compared to the 521 war veterans in Washington State, out of the 306,000 veterans in our State who may obtain a home loan, if this bill is passed, thousands need better medical care and other thousands of veterans, due to the rise in living costs, need an increase in their pension.

First things should get first consideration. We ought to get the Federal budget in balance and then as a first step toward aiding veterans should take steps to provide the sick and ailing veteran with better medical care and better hospital facilities and to provide a more realistic pension system for veterans.

Providing better medical care and hospital care for the veterans and granting a pension increase to veterans will do more for vastly greater numbers of veterans than establishing a fund of $300 million, and putting the country that much further in debt, to provide home loans to the 521 Washington State veterans who are seeking direct loans to acquire homes.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I have no great enthusiasm for the provisions of H.R. 2256 which seek to raise the interest rate on GI loans up to 5¼ percent. In my judgment, the availability of mortgage money is controlled more by Federal Reserve discount policies which generally regulate the supply of credit than by an increase in the interest rates which simply bring inflated prices into the money market.

In my judgment the increased housing starts of the second half of 1958 were the proximate result of temporary relaxation of the tight money policies during the critical periods of the recession. There is little reason for attributing increased housing starts to higher interest rates.

Raising the cost of GI home-buying money is inflationary in every respect. It will simply drain off loan money presently being absorbed in the FHA loan market. The net result will be increased pressures to raise FHA interest rates. The GI loan interest rate is a base upon which all housing loan rates are established. As this base rate increases, all interest rates will be forced upward. The burden of these higher interest rates are a quiet but steady drain on the reserves of the home buyer.

The steady rise in the cost of borrowing money under the present administration constitutes one of the most inflationary forces in this generation. The home buyer is subjected to a double-barreled inflationary pressure. He is forced to buy a home at an inflated price—and he is then compelled to pay an inflated rate of interest for the life of his loan. The long-range consequence of this high interest folly is yet to be faced. The effects of Federal Reserve money manipulation should certainly be studied by this Congress in open and complete hearings.

The acceptance of an amendment in the Committee of the Whole to extend the direct loan program beyond rural areas to benefit veterans in cities where sufficient private funds are not available for GI loans makes this bill more palatable. In many communities the bankers have flatly refused to consider GI loans as a matter of arbitrary policy. The possibility of a designation of a city as a housing credit shortage area may cause such bankers to think twice before arbitrary denial of GI loans.

In the Cleveland area over 620,000 veterans have not taken advantage of the GI bill under the home loan guarantee program, principally because our local banking interests have refused to consider broad-scale GI loan proposals. The use of the GI loan privilege in the Cleveland area is well below national averages. Housing needs are just about as serious as can be found anywhere.

In the Cleveland area, including Cleveland and 38 counties, the following guaranteed loans have been made:

Year	Number	Amount
1954	11,018	$117,697,544
1955	16,726	188,846,492
1956	14,499	173,076,460
1957	7,638	100,320,996
1958	2,654	36,038,316

Direct loans have not been made in the Cleveland urban area—but in the 38 rural counties the following direct loans were made:

Year	Number	Amount
1954	273	$2,090,346
1955	461	3,610,736
1956	226	1,699,251
1957	523	4,213,972
1958	245	2,097,033

In our cities the adoption of the amendment permitting cities to apply for designation as "housing credit shortage areas" may make GI loans available to minority groups which now suffer a maximum need for home-loan borrowings. It is my hope that the administrator of this program will seriously consider the needs of these veterans who have been almost completely disregarded in the housing program to date.

While I vigorously protest the three-stage inflationary rise in interest rates which will be precipitated by this legislation, I believe that it is essential to the veteran and to the economy that there be a revitalization in the GI home building program. I hope that this measure will live up to promised expectations in that regard.

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for H.R. 2256. I did favor and support the amendment which would have eliminated direct loans. The record shows that this provision would have no practical application to Connecticut. In addition, I very strongly favor the provisions permitting an increase in interest rates because I feel that this increase will start bank funds growing out in the form of GI loans and that the direct loan provision will be rendered more or less academic. Finally, I know that in my section, existing lending institutions will adequately do the job of servicing these veterans applications and I see no need for governmental intervention in this field.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Chairman, citizens of Wisconsin have for many months been deeply concerned with the ever-increasing spiral in the cost of living. Inflation is becoming a major threat to the American economy. Inflation is brought about through ever-increasing prices of commodities and the resulting need for increased wages to permit working men and women to keep pace with the increased cost of living. This ceaseless price and wage increase has been a major cause of the high cost of living in America today.

We here in Congress have witnessed this year another cause of the inflationary spiral and in the months ahead it will become increasingly apparent to the people of the country that there are other factors contributing to the high cost of living besides higher wages and increased costs.

The Veterans' Administration was originally established as a means of enabling veterans of World War II and the Korean conflict to secure housing for themselves and their families at somewhat less than the full rate of interest. FHA financing was inaugurated to give all citizens assurance that they could provide housing for themselves and their families at a moderate cost. From the beginning, it has been understood that interest rates under FHA financing would be higher than interest rates under VA financing. We have, however, witnessed, especially in rural and urban areas, a virtual refusal of capital to enter into the VA program of financing. Banks, building and loan companies, and other financial institutions have and are refusing to make VA loans at the current interest rate of 4¾ percent. This rate is only one-half of 1 percent lower than the FHA interest rate and this rate has already been raised several times by previous Congresses.

Each time that the VA interest rate has been raised, the FHA has followed suit by increasing the interest rate on FHA loans. We have no reason to believe that the present VA interest rate increase will be met with any different response by officials of the Federal Housing Administration and I predict that the one-half of 1 percent increase in the VA interest rate will result in a similar increase in FHA loans. This will bring FHA interest rates to 5¾ percent. The criminal part of the situation, however, is that when the Federal agency interest rates are upped, this increase is accepted by private bankers as a license to increase private interest rates to private borrowers from our Nation's banks and I predict that the 5¾ percent interest on FHA loans will, during the summer and fall of 1959, result in private interest rates to private borrowers, across the board, of 6½ percent.

This interest rate is too high. It is inflationary. It is increasing the cost of living. The borrower has less money left when making the loan than he had before—just as the housewife has fewer groceries in her shopping basket for the money spent than she had before. There have been three increases in the past 3 years and undoubtedly 1960 will see further demands by the bankers to increase—first, the VA interest rate, then the FHA interest rate, then the private loan interest rate.

It is true the bankers made little or no appearance before Congress. They did not need to—for they had the American Legion and some other veterans' organizations, not including the VFW, and the National Association of Building Contractors to fight their battle for them.

I view this increase in the cost of using money with alarm. I view it as such because it has a direct effect upon inflation which besets our economy. I view it as such because the very people who are complaining loudest about the cost-wage inflationary spiral are the same people who championed for the fourth time the interest inflationary spiral.

I am for loans for the veterans at a moderate cost. I do not consider 5¼ percent interest a moderate cost to a veteran. This is especially true when the veteran is required to pay from 2 to 11 points for the privilege of getting the veteran's loan. We have failed in granting this increase to hold the line against inflation.

I, like many others who voted for this bill, did so because it represents the only way Congress provided of enabling veterans to get any loans at all, and because the bill carried a direct loan provision of $300 million. This provision will enable veterans in rural and urban areas to secure loans. The money market in these areas has dried up and without this direct loan provision, the Veterans' Housing Act is of no value to veterans who do not live in the large centers of population.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly, the Committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. THORNBERRY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 2256) to amend chapter 37 of title 38, United States Code, to provide additional funds for direct loans; to remove certain requirements with respect to the rate of interest on guaranteed loans; and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 154, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TEAGUE of California. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. TEAGUE of California. I am.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman qualifies. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TEAGUE of California moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Veterans Affairs with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: Strike out all of section 1.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the previous question is ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken and there were—yeas 123, nays 277, not voting 34, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 3 legislative days within which to extend their remarks in the body of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING CLERK TO CORRECT PARAGRAPH AND SECTION NUMBERS OF H.R. 2256

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized in the engrossment of the bill to correct paragraphs and sections thereof because of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULTER].

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

EXTENDING PROVISIONS OF UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING AND SERVICE ACT, PERSONNEL STRENGTHS OF THE ARMED FORCES, AND DEPENDENTS ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1950

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up the resolution (H. Res. 153) providing for the consideration of H.R. 2260, a bill to extend until July 1, 1963, the induction provisions of the Universal Military Training and Service Act; the provisions of the act of August 3, 1950, suspending personnel strengths of the Armed Forces; and the Dependents Assistance Act of 1950, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2260) to extend until July 1, 1963, the induction provisions of the Universal Military Training and Service Act; the provisions of the act of August 3, 1950, suspending personnel strengths of the Armed Forces; and the Dependents Assistance Act of 1950. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed five hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Armed Services, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the usual 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] and I now yield myself such time as I may briefly consume.

Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution to extend the draft, as it is commonly known. The bill would provide briefly for the extension of this authority to induct our young men into the armed services for a period of 4 years. It would extend the so-called doctor's draft law from its present expiration date, July 1, 1959, to July 1, 1963, a period of 4 years. It extends the suspension on a strength limitation of the Armed Forces from the present termination date to 1963. It extends the Dependents Assistance Act, Briefly, that is what the bill does.

Now, in the hearing before the Committee on Rules there was no opposition expressed to that committee in the granting of a rule for the extension of the act itself, although there was some testimony to the effect that possibly it should be limited to a 2-year period.

I am one of those who will go along with this bill reluctantly. I say reluctantly because I regret the necessity for the continuation of the so-called draft; but as long as we have the situation that exists in the world today; that is, a bad neighbor on the other side for whom this country did so much when it had its back against the wall, we must have adequate defense for the possibility—and I use the word advisedly—of an attack from that potential enemy.

Frankly, I still subscribe to the theory that the Russians want neither war or peace but that they want to make us spend ourselves into bankruptcy and then take over in the ensuing chaos, a statement I have been making in the well of this House for the past 12 years. On the other hand, we cannot take the chance of not being prepared to prevent their provoking hostilities, because if we become too weak they would take advantage of that situation and would overrun us, if necessary.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat, I regret the necessity for an extension of this legislation which would draft our young men into service and interrupt the orderly continuity of their lives, but with the situation being what it is and this being the fairest method of approach to military service, I urge the adoption of this resolution and ask for the careful consideration of the bill itself.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, this rule makes in order consideration of H.R. 2260, a bill to extend until July 1, 1963, the Universal Military Training and Service Act. It is an open rule and provides for 5 hours of general debate. The Rules Committee provided for long debate because they realized this bill is extremely controversial.

Some believe the present law is discriminatory and inequitable; that it is inefficient and is administered extravagantly and wasteful.

Other conscientious people believe conscription is alien to the American tradition.

For these reasons an open rule is provided making the bill open to amendments.

While I am aware that some are opposed to this bill I am not aware of any one opposing the rule.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS].

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, there has been a good deal of talk this afternoon about the Federal deficit. There is another spending scheme that we will be called upon to take over, and it should be of interest to every Member of Congress.

About a month ago there was established in the United Nations a new agency called the Special Fund which hopes to have $2 billion to $5 billion to hand out annually. Named as managing director is one, Paul G. Hoffman, and he is peculiarly fitted for the job. He could not make a success of the Studebaker company so, in 1949, President Truman made him the directing genius of the foreign giveaway setup—the Economic Cooperation Administration, as it was then known.

What could be more fitting? Hoffman could not make a success of his own business so he was given the job of distributing billions of dollars to panhandlers all over the world.

Then came 1952, and this top-graded employee of the New Deal internationalists showed up as a modern Republican. Since then he has flitted in and out of the Eisenhower administration with the greatest of ease, as have others who were bosom pals of the New Dealers when they were riding high in the White House.

Now Hoffman has landed on his feet again, undoubtedly with White House approval, as managing director of the innocuous-sounding United Nations Special Fund. What does Hoffman want? As we said earlier—only $2 billion to $5 billion a year.

Where are these billions to be obtained? They are to be drawn, says Hoffman, from individual Government lending agencies such as the World Bank, American foreign aid, and private investment.

But the Chicago Tribune news service quotes Hoffman as saying: "We will take money wherever we can get it."

No one knowing the record will doubt that.

Already, funds from one specific source are assured. The U.N. General Assembly, when it set up the Special Fund, specified that 40 percent of the costs are to be defrayed by the United States and the rest by other contributing governments.

What other contributing governments? If experience with some other U.N. funds is any criterion, American taxpayers will put up the cash and anything else contributed will be the air in the bag they have been left holding.

Incidentally, this is another example of how an aggregation of foreigners, plus some of our own internationalists, can sit down in New York or some far away place and vote what amounts to an indirect tax levy on the American people.

What is the purpose of this United Nations Special Fund? To aid "underdeveloped countries," of course, and it is reported that Hoffman is showing great interest in the development of the lower Mekong River Basin which stretches for 2,800 miles through Cambodia, Laos, Thailand, and Vietnam.

From South Bend, Ind., to the United Nations in New York, to the Mekong River in southeast Asia is quite a jump even for a more than ordinary do-gooder, but with a few stopovers in Washington, with the proper New Deal-modern Republican approach, and with the experience of spending a few billions of other people's money, it appears that the necessary agility can be developed.

We would like to put the Appropriations Committee on notice now that when the spending bills come rolling to the House floor we will be looking for further information concerning this new multi-billion-dollar special fund and the activities in connection therewith of Managing Director Paul G. Hoffman.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this rule. I remember one night a good many years ago when the draft bill came up for debate. I remember the extreme tenseness of the House, the feeling of opposition to the draft, but I voted for it and I remember that that bill passed by only one vote.

Sometime I would like to tell some of the Members of the arguments I heard before the bill came up. I never regretted that vote for one instant because we were viciously attacked by Japan just a few weeks afterward.

Today a little Boy Scout named Murphy from my district gave me one of the Scout pins that we see in the lapels of so many Members of the House and I was very proud.

That boy is 12 years old, one of the finest youngsters I have ever seen. He is learning to speak Russian in order to understand the Russian people so that we may be protected. He knows a good deal of Russian as it is. After talking with him I could not vote for anything but continuation of the draft, unpleasant as it may be. He is preparing every way he can. He sets a great example.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

TO AMEND SECTION 200 OF THE SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' CIVIL RELIEF ACT OF 1940

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 3313, to amend section 200 of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940 to permit the establishment of certain facts by a declaration under penalty of perjury in lieu of an affidavit, which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services, be rereferred to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

FIRE SAFETY IN THE SCHOOLS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. AUCHINCLOSS] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, under the law the Congress of the United States is responsible for the welfare and protection of the District of Columbia, and I have always considered it a great privilege to serve on the committee in Congress which has this responsibility under its jurisdiction. Accordingly, when the country was shocked by the tragic fire which occurred in Chicago on December 1, 1958, when some 90 schoolchildren were trapped and met their death in a devastating fire, I was reminded of my own responsibility as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia and I decided to find out if the schools in the District were properly equipped and secured against any similar tragedy. Even though investigations of the cause of the Chicago fire revealed there were no violations of the law or regulations, nevertheless it was disclosed that that particular school building did not have the fire safety provisions required of new structures, and such a revelation gives one pause for thought. Schoolchildren are entitled to every protection possible no matter when their school building may have been built and it is the duty of the Congress as the responsible governing body of the District to see that they get it.

Therefore, under date of December 3, 1958, I addressed a letter to M. H. Sutton, Fire Chief of the District of Columbia, asking about the fire safety conditions in all the schools in the District—public, private, and parochial. A copy of my letter to the Chief is appended at the end of my remarks, marked "Exhibit A."

In reply to my letter Chief Sutton sent the Fire Marshal of the District, Raymond C. Roberts, to see me, and I had a most informative and frank discussion with him. As a result of our talk, Fire Marshal Roberts submitted a report to Chief Sutton, dated January 21, 1959, and the Chief sent a copy of it to me in a letter dated January 23, 1959. This report is printed at the close of my remarks, exhibit B.

I would like to point out some of the features of this report that should have the prompt attention of the District Committee.

The Fire Marshal advises:

> Enclosing of all vertical shafts such as stairways and elevator shafts and providing floor fire cutoffs with fire doors plus the installation of an automatic sprinkler system is the only way to hold to a minimum the loss of life and property from fire in the older non-fire-resistive constructed buildings.

This statement by an expert is a matter for close and thorough consideration by the District Committee which I am sure will be undertaken.

Under the title of "Fire Doors" the Fire Marshal reports that:

> Fire doors are required to be installed by the building code of the District of Columbia in every new school erected. New construction is not the problem confronting us today.

He reports further that—

> As of this year, with the already available funds, it is expected that every elementary school coming under the District of Columbia Board of Education will be equipped with interior enclosed stairways.

This, of course, is most reassuring, but he goes on to say:

> To the best of my knowledge there is no such plan or program to bring the private and parochial schools up to present code requirements.

This state of affairs should be corrected and there is no doubt that our committee will give it appropriate attention.

The Fire Marshal calls attention to an exception made in certain instances to the use of fire extinguishers as follows:

> Fire extinguishers are required to be installed in every school by the building code of the District of Columbia with the exception of buildings not more than two stories in height having enclosed stairs and having a gross floor area in the second story of not more than 3,000 square feet.

I am pleased to note the following statement in this report, however, but I wonder if the recommendation should not have the force and the authority of law back of it:

> In an effort to correct this, the Fire Chief will recommend to the Director, Department of Licenses and Inspections, District of Columbia, that the building code of the District of Columbia be amended by deleting the above referred to exception.
> To the best of our knowledge all schools with the exception of those schools used which do not require extinguishers because of the exception in the code, are provided with fire extinguishers, adequate in number of an approved type, and maintained properly.

In speaking of the local private fire alarm system, the Fire Marshal reports that:

> Private fire alarm systems (for evacuation purposes only) are required to be installed in every school by the building code of the District of Columbia with the exception of buildings not more than two stories in height having enclosed stairs and having a gross floor area in the second story of not more than 3,000 square feet.

It is good to have the assurance which follows that:

> To the best of our knowledge all schools with the exception of those schools used which do not require private fire alarm systems because of the exception in the code, are provided with local fire alarm systems in an operable condition.

The exception provided for in this rule should have the attention and study of the committee.

Emergency lighting, of course, is important and Fire Marshal Roberts reports in part as follows on this matter:

The requirements as to when they (light) shall be used as well as exceptions as to when it will not be necessary to have the lights burning are contained in the electrical code of the District of Columbia. It is my feeling that these exceptions to the code and indefinite requirements are unwarranted, and in an effort to correct this, the Fire Chief will recommend to the Director, Department of Licenses and Inspections, District of Columbia, that all reference to maintenance of emergency lights be deleted from the electrical code. Simultaneously a recommendation will be made to make the maintenance of emergency lighting a part of the police regulations thereby making it a responsibility of the Fire Department.

Why any exceptions should be made in emergency lighting should have the careful consideration of the committee.

Everyone knows that fire exit drills are most important and I have always thought they were a regular part of the school curriculum so I was not only surprised but somewhat startled to read this in the Fire Marshal's report:

Schools under the public school system in my opinion hold an adequate number of fire exit drills during the course of each school year, however, the occurrence of such drills during the first 3 months of school is a matter of concern. Private and parochial schools do not, in my opinion, hold an adequate number of fire exit drills during the course of each school year. Inquiry has developed the facts that fire exit drills are not held with the frequency deemed adequate. At the present time there are no regulations requiring fire exit drills.

Something must be done to correct this situation even if it is necessary to enact a law to bring this about; I am surprised to learn from the report that the executives of some schools do not consider this important.

In the event of a fire perhaps the most important factor to prevent panic and save life is the facility to summon the fire department; any delay in securing its aid may well be disastrous. The following excerpt from the Fire Marshal's report is most disturbing.

Facilities for calling the fire department are generally limited to the use of the telephone or by sounding an alarm through the use of a municipal fire alarm box. A municipal fire alarm box within a reasonable distance (300 feet) is not available at every school nor does every school have a telephone. The telephone alone should not be accepted as adequate for the transmission of an alarm of fire. A municipal fire alarm box connected directly with the fire department is the most reliable form of transmitting an alarm of fire.

As far as I can learn there are 83 school buildings that either have no telephone or are located further than 300 feet from any municipal fire alarm box. This is a most serious matter and should be corrected without delay. I am in favor of a law requiring that a fire alarm box be installed in every school building, hospital, nursing home, and place of assembly in the District. In that way as nearly as is humanly possible assistance is assured without delay, many injuries avoided and lives saved.

These are a few of the highlights of this excellent and informative report, and I hope my colleagues will read it and add their comments, criticisms, and suggestions for the benefit of the District Committee. I know I speak for the members of this committee when I say that they are as interested as I am in the welfare and protection of our children and of the sick in the District of Columbia. I am confident that the District Committee will go into all these matters with scrupulous care, and if legislation is indicated, will present it promptly to the House for its consideration.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., December 3, 1958.

Chief MILLARD H. SUTTON,
District of Columbia Fire Department,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHIEF SUTTON: In the light of the recent horrible fire disaster in Chicago it is natural that we should do everything possible to see that our own city is properly safeguarded. Therefore, as the ranking minority member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I am writing to ask you as Fire Chief of the District of Columbia if provisions for safety against fire are fully carried out by all the schools in the District of Columbia, including public, parochial, and private schools.

Are all these schools equipped with adequate fire escapes, fire doors, fire extinguishers, fire alarms, etc. and do they have adequate fire drills? Are facilities also at hand to summon the fire department in case of emergency? In addition to that, I would request your opinion as to whether the fire safety laws covering all the schools in the District of Columbia are adequate and if not, in what respect should they be amended?

I am fully aware of your keen interest in this matter and of your extraordinarily fine and competent service as Fire Chief to the people of the District of Columbia and I feel sure that you would welcome any effort to improve our situation here so that a disaster such as has just occurred in Chicago would not occur.

Thanking you for your cooperation and with my warmest personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JAMES C. AUCHINCLOSS,
Member of Congress.

GOVERNMENT OF THE
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
FIRE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D.C., January 23, 1959.

JAMES C. AUCHINCLOSS,
Member of Congress,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Attached find reports from our Fire Marshal, which I hope will answer the questions in your letter of December 3, 1958.

I am sorry that my reply to you was delayed until this time.

Sincerely,

M. H. SUTTON,
Fire Chief.

FIRE PREVENTION DIVISION,
January 21, 1959.

Re fire safety in schools in the District of Columbia.

To FIRE CHIEF,
District of Columbia Fire Department:

Information of record indicates that the following list comprises the number and type of schools within the District of Columbia.

Public schools under the jurisdiction of the District of Columbia Board of Education:

Elementary (including Americanization and Health), 123.
Elementary annexes and demountables, 11.
Junior high schools, 23.
Senior high schools (including Veterans High), 10.
Vocational high schools, 5.
Teachers College, 1.

Schools under the jurisdiction of the Office of Education, Archdiocese of Washington, located within the District of Columbia:

Elementary, 32.
Secondary, 16.
Special schools, 4.
Universities, 2.
Colleges, 4.

Schools under the jurisdiction of private owners and operators:

Elementary (includes some parochial), 19.
Secondary and secondary technical, 30.
Colleges (includes U.S. Government—Gallaudet), 2.
Universities (includes some U.S. Government—Howard), 5.

There are various other adult educational institutions which are located in buildings used for other purposes such as office buildings. These occupancies are not listed due to the fact that the buildings in which these schools are located come under occupancy requirements of the major occupancy of the building and have a limitation on the number of students in keeping with available exit facilities.

There are 90 day-care (nursery schools) groups for children whose ages range anywhere from 2 to 6 years, and attendance ranges anywhere from 6 to 200 students. These day care groups are located in all types of occupancies such as private homes, churches, rooms in apartment buildings, etc. This particular type of school, or group as it is called, is under the direct supervision of the Department of Public Health, Bureau of Maternal and Child Health, Child Care Standards Section.

An inspection is made by the Fire Department at least once a year of every known day care group (nursery school) location, and any conditions found that are contrary to any law or regulation are ordered corrected or brought to the attention, in writing, of the department or agency responsible for having the conditions corrected.

In reply to the specific questions outlined in the letter from Congressman AUCHINCLOSS, I will attempt to answer these questions in the same order that they were presented:

1. Fire escapes.
2. Fire doors.
3. Fire extinguishers.
4. Fire alarms.
5. Emergency lighting.
6. Fire drills.
7. Facilities available to call the fire department.
8. The adequacy of fire safety laws for schools.
9. Any recommendations for amendments to laws.

FIRE ESCAPES

Outside fire escapes or interior fire stairways are required to be installed in or on every school by the building code of the District of Columbia. If the building was erected and used as a school prior to March 8, 1946, outside fire escapes were permitted. Since that date all school buildings erected or buildings converted to school use have interior fire stairways or exterior screened fire stairways.

The fact that a building has an outside fire escape is no assurance as to the safety of the occupants therein. The very presence of an outside fire escape indicates immediately that the building is deficient in safe egress facilities thereby necessitating the installation of an outside fire escape.

Outside fire escapes present many problems not generally known, such as not being lighted for use during the night time, subjected to all kinds of weather, snow and ice; not suited for use by young children, aged, infirm, or crippled persons.

Any fire in a room leading onto a fire escape may render the entire fire escape unusable due to fire coming out of a window below onto fire escape.

Movable drop ladder from last landing to ground is controlled by counterbalanced weights on cable passing over at least two pulleys. To operate, it is necessary for a person to offset the counterbalance and allow the ladder to go to the ground.

The installation of fire escapes is definitely not the answer to life safety in non-fire-resistive constructed buildings having inadequate safe egress facilities for a high life hazard occupancy.

Enclosing of all vertical shafts such as stairways and elevator shafts and providing floor fire cutoffs with fire doors plus the installation of an automatic sprinkler system is the only way to hold to a minimum the loss of life and property from fire in the older non-fire-resistive constructed buildings.

FIRE DOORS

Reference made to fire doors in this statement will be limited to fire doors on stairways because I feel that the most important problem with regards to doors is the presence of or lack of fire doors on stairways.

Fire doors are required to be installed by the building code of the District of Columbia in every new school erected. New construction is not the problem confronting us today.

The major problem is those buildings erected prior to the date of enactment of code requirements for enclosed stairways and installation of fire doors.

The District of Columbia Board of Education instituted a program in the public schools some 8 years ago to enclose stairways and install fire doors in all schools deficient in this respect and eliminate other known fire hazards.

This program has gone forward for the past 8 years in keeping with budget allowances and as of this year, with the already available funds, it is expected that every elementary school coming under the District of Columbia Board of Education will be equipped with interior enclosed stairways.

Budget requests will be made each succeeding year until every school under the jurisdiction of the District of Columbia Board of Education has been equipped with enclosed stairways and other known fire hazards eliminated.

To the best of my knowledge there is no such plan or program to bring the private and parochial schools up to present code requirements.

A building code with retroactive features applicable to certain existing buildings is the only method I know to bring these buildings up to an equivalent of the safety standards as the present code requires for new construction.

FIRE EXTINGUISHERS

Fire extinguishers are required to be installed in every school by the building code of the District of Columbia with the exception of buildings not more than two stories in height having enclosed stairs and having a gross floor area in the second story of not more than 3,000 square feet.

Due to the high life hazard involved in any assembly of persons inside of any building, irrespective of height, it is my feeling that the exception made in the building code of the District of Columbia should be deleted and no exception be made whatsoever.

In an effort to correct this, the Fire Chief will recommend to the Director, Department of Licenses and Inspections, D.C., that the building code of the District of Columbia be amended by deleting the above referred to exception.

To the best of our knowledge all schools with the exception of those schools used which do not require extinguishers because of the exception in the code, are provided with fire extinguishers, adequate in number, of an approved type and maintained properly.

PRIVATE (LOCAL) FIRE ALARM SYSTEM

Private fire alarm systems (for evacuation purposes only) are required to be installed in every school by the Building Code of the District of Columbia with the exception of buildings not more than two stories in height having enclosed stairs and having a gross floor area in the second story of not more than 3,000 square feet.

Due to the high life hazard involved in any assembly of persons inside of any building, irrespective of height, it is my feeling that the exception made in the building code of the District of Columbia should be deleted and no exceptions be made whatsoever.

In an effort to correct this, the Fire Chief will recommend to the Director, Department of Licenses and Inspections, D.C., that the building code of the District of Columbia be amended by deleting the above referred to exception.

To the best of our knowledge all schools with the exception of those schools used which do not require private fire alarm systems because of the exception in the code, are provided with local fire alarm systems in an operable condition.

EMERGENCY LIGHTING

The installation of facilities for emergency lighting is required in all schools by the Building Code of the District of Columbia and/or the Electrical Code of the District of Columbia, with the exception of buildings not more than two stories in height having enclosed stairs and having a gross floor area in the second story of not more than 3,000 square feet.

Due to the high life hazard involved in any assembly of persons inside of any building, irrespective of height, it is my feeling that the exception made in the Building Code of the District of Columbia should be deleted and no exceptions be made whatsoever.

In an effort to correct this, the fire chief will recommend to the Director, Department of Licenses and Inspections, District of Columbia, that the Building Code of the District of Columbia be amended by deleting the above referred to exception.

To the best of our knowledge all schools with the exception of those schools used which do not have the facilities due to the exceptions in the code are provided with emergency lighting or recommendations have been made to so equip.

The requirements as to when they (lights) shall be used as well as exceptions as to when it will not be necessary to have the lights burning are contained in the Electrical Code of the District of Columbia.

It is my feeling that these exceptions to the code and indefinite requirements are unwarranted, and in an effort to correct this, the Fire Chief will recommend to the Director, Department of Licenses and Inspections, District of Columbia, that all reference to maintenance of emergency lights be deleted from the electrical code. Simultaneously a recommendation will be made to make the maintenance of emergency lighting a part of the police regulations thereby making it a responsibility of the Fire Department.

FIRE EXIT DRILLS

Schools under the public school system in my opinion hold an adequate number of fire exit drills during the course of each school year; however, the occurrence of such drills during the first 3 months of school is a matter of concern.

Private and parochial schools do not, in my opinion, hold an adequate number of fire exit drills during the course of each school year.

Inquiry has developed the facts that fire exit drills are not held with the frequency deemed adequate. At the present time there are no regulations requiring fire exit drills.

In an effort to correct this deficiency, it is to be proposed by the Fire Chief to the District of Columbia Commissioners that a regulation be adopted making it mandatory that all public, private, and parochial schools, colleges and universities or similar places of learning hold fire exit drills according to a prescribed requirement.

The adoption of such a regulation will, in my opinion, greatly improve the fire exit drill problem in all schools within the District of Columbia.

AVAILABLE FACILITIES FOR CALLING THE FIRE DEPARTMENT

Facilities for calling the fire department are generally limited to the use of the telephone or by sounding an alarm through the use of a municipal fire alarm box.

A municipal fire alarm box within a reasonable distance (300 feet) is not available at every school nor does every school have a telephone. The telephone alone should not be accepted as adequate for the transmission of an alarm of fire. A municipal fire alarm box connected directly with the fire department is the most reliable form of transmitting an alarm of fire.

Direct connection with the fire department through the medium of a municipal fire alarm box or a remote control station connected to a master box is available at 111 school buildings.

A municipal fire alarm box is located within 300 feet of 143 school buildings.

The remainder of the schools are located farther than 300 feet from any municipal fire alarm box.

The National Board of Fire Underwriters in pamphlet No. 73, July 1958, article 240, section 2434, states: "Schools, hospitals, nursing homes, and places of public assembly should have a box at or near the entrance."

At or near would certainly mean within sight of the entrance. I concur with their recommendation and have in the past made numerous recommendations in the annual public school inspection reports, that every school building should be provided with a city fire alarm box to expedite notification of the fire department. There is no law or regulation requiring such an installation but the recommendation was made as additional reliable means of notification.

Every building wherein a local fire alarm system (evacuation alarm) is installed, a sign is required directly below the striking station stating whether or not the system is connected to the municipal fire alarm system; also stating the location of the nearest municipal fire alarm box and the telephone number of the fire department.

Where a municipal fire alarm box is located within 300 feet of the entrance and visible from the sidewalk in front of the school and the location of the fire alarm box is posted as required by regulation cited above, it should be accepted as adequate for existing schools.

Locations where the distance to a municipal fire alarm box exceeds 300 feet or is hidden from view from the sidewalk in front of the school by being around the corner should not be accepted as adequate. A survey should be made and corrective action taken so as to provide a municipal fire alarm box within 300 feet of the entrance of every school, hospital, home for the aged, and similar types of occupancies. This could be accomplished by moving existing municipal fire alarm boxes or installing new ones. This program, no doubt, would require considerable expenditure of funds for material and labor and should be made a project for the immediate future.

In general, I believe that fire safety regulations as contained in the various codes and regulations as now written and applied to new construction are adequate with a few exceptions, such as those items previously referred to, and corrective action is anticipated in these instances.

There is, however, one big problem that confronts all officials charged with maintaining adequate laws and regulations insofar as fire safety is concerned, and that is the inability to require existing buildings to comply with the features required by recently enacted codes or regulations. The retroactive application of present regulations to existing structures has always been defeated on the basis of it being unreasonable to require existing buildings to comply with new code requirements.

The absurdity of exempting existing structures from compliance with fire safety laws or regulations because they were adopted at a later date was never more tragically demonstrated than by the recent school fire in Chicago. The fact that this disaster just happened to occur in Chicago should not be taken lightly by responsible officials here or elsewhere. The same sort of potential probably exists in many other locations throughout the country.

It might be said that there were no violations of law or regulations in the particular building where the 93 lives were lost, but the presence or absence of any violations of law or regulations is no measure of life safety from fire in this type of building.

I am greatly concerned about the moral violations as well as the legal ones. Property owners must be made to realize their responsibility for fire safety by laws and regulations and not permitted to ignore hazardous conditions just because they're not covered in the law. Unless they are required by law or regulations to bring a building up to certain standards, owners will not willingly or by mere persuasion spend sums of money for safeguarding their buildings from fire.

Today millions of dollars are being spent for urban renewal projects, improvement of highways, safety programs in industry and government, all of which are designed in the interest of preserving or protecting lives of human beings from disease, crime or accidents. Yet known deficiencies of high life hazards from fire are allowed to continue in our schools, multifamily occupancies, convalescent homes, nursing homes, homes for the aged, orphan asylums and various other types of occupancies, all because of the failure to enact laws or regulation holding owners directly responsible for the safety of the occupants of any building under their control. Until such a law or regulation is enacted, the potentials will continue to exist, irrespective of the efforts on the part of enforcement authorities to convince owners that hazardous conditions exist and should be corrected.

The Department of Licenses and Inspections of the District of Columbia, which is charged with the administering of the Code of the District of Columbia, is at the present time preparing a revision of the Building Code of the District of Columbia, one section of which is proposed to apply retroactively to existing buildings. If and when this proposed section becomes effective, action can be instituted and existing deficiencies will in time be corrected.

It is anticipated that strong protests will be instituted against the enactment of the section of the building code dealing with the retroactive application of the code. Until this section of the code is enacted into an enforcible regulation, hazardous conditions insofar as existing buildings are concerned will remain uncorrected for lack of authority to require such corrective measures.

Accompanying this report are three recommendations to be forwarded to the District of Columbia Commissioners and two recommendations to the Director, Department of Licenses and Inspections for amendments to the Police Regulations of the District of Columbia and the Building Code of the District of Columbia.

Respectfully submitted,

RAYMOND C. ROBERTS,
Fire Marshal, District of Columbia.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE FIRE MARSHAL, FIRE PREVENTION DIVISION

January 21, 1959.

TO FIRE CHIEF,
District of Columbia Fire Department.

Re proposed amendments to the Police Regulations of the District of Columbia.

It is recommended that the following proposed amendments be made the subject of a communication from you to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, recommending that they be considered for adoption and inclusion in the Police Regulations of the District of Columbia.

FIRE EXIT DRILLS

Owners, operators, or persons in charge of all public, parochial, and private schools, colleges, universities, and similar places of learning within the District of Columbia shall see that fire exit drills are held in all school buildings.

(a) Fire exit drills shall be held at least six times between the opening of the school term in September and the 15th of December of each year, and at least one fire exit drill shall be held each month thereafter until school closes.

(b) Fire exit drills shall be held at least two (2) times during any special session such as night school, summer school, or similar assemblage that does not extend beyond a 2-month period (once each month when over 2 months).

(c) A written report of each fire exit drill held, showing date and time, shall be forwarded to the Fire Marshal of the District of Columbia.

EMERGENCY LIGHTING

Whenever emergency lighting is required to be installed by the Building Code of the District of Columbia and/or the Electrical Code of the District of Columbia and so provided, it shall be arranged, controlled, and maintained so as to be kept lighted at all times during the use or occupancy of such buildings.

Note: The aforesaid to go into the Police Regulations of the District of Columbia (later to go in the Fire Code) to replace sections 7007, 7007–1, 7007–2, 7007–3, of article 700, chapter 7, of the Electrical Code of the District of Columbia which were deleted.

FIRE SAFETY

Owners, operators, or persons in charge of any building shall be held responsible for the safety from fire of its occupants to the extent of circumstances within their control, such as the maintenance, proper functioning, and availability of all fire safety devices such as fire extinguishers, fire alarm systems, emergency lights, fire exitways, fire stairways, fire doors, and fire escapes as well as compliance with all fire safety regulations. Failure on the part of anyone responsible to comply with the above shall be cause sufficient for the Fire Marshal or his representative to take immediate action to assure compliance.

RAYMOND C. ROBERTS,
Fire Marshal, District of Columbia.

FIRE PREVENTION DIVISION,

January 21, 1959.

Re proposed amendment to the Building Code of the District of Columbia.

TO FIRE CHIEF,
District of Columbia Fire Department.

It is recommended that the following proposed amendment be made the subject of a communication from you to the Director, Department of Licenses and Inspections, D.C., for consideration.

In view of the high life hazard that exists in all schools, irrespective of height or square foot area, it is recommended for your consideration that the Building Code of the District of Columbia be amended so as to require automatic sprinkler systems in all existing schools of non-fire-resistive construction, or schools erected prior to March 8, 1946, as well as all new schools of non-fire-resistive construction.

There must be some definite language prepared in order that retroactive application of any regulation will accomplish the intent to require all schools to be equipped with automatic sprinkler systems.

RAYMOND C. ROBERTS,
Fire Marshal, District of Columbia.

FIRE PREVENTION DIVISION,

January 21, 1959.

TO FIRE CHIEF, District of Columbia Fire Department.

Re proposed amendments to the Building and Electrical Codes of the District of Columbia.

It is recommended that the following proposed amendments be made the subject of a communication from you to the Director, Department of Licenses and Inspection, District of Columbia, for consideration.

In view of the high life hazard that exists in all schools, irrespective of heights or square foot area, it is recommended that article 603–05, paragraph 5, of the Building Code of the District of Columbia and article 7006.4 of the Electrical Code of the District of Columbia be deleted.

These paragraphs deal with exceptions to the code which, in my opinion, should not be made.

It is recommended further that inasmuch as the Fire Prevention Division of the District of Columbia Fire Department is responsible for the maintenance of emergency lighting, sections 7007, 7007–1, 7007–2, 7007–3, of article 700, chapter 7, of the Electrical Code of the District of Columbia be deleted.

It has already been proposed to the Commissioners that the police regulations be amended by inserting a section to cover the maintenance of emergency lighting in order that it could be properly enforced by the Fire Prevention Division.

RAYMOND C. ROBERTS,
Fire Marshal, District of Columbia.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. ALBERT. I want to congratulate our friend on this very fine and constructive statement.

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include certain letters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

FOURTEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF INDEPENDENCE OF CEYLON

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BONNER). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, today, February 4, is the 14th anniversary of the independence of Ceylon. When I attended the Asian-African Conference in Bandung, Indonesia, I promised that I would salute those countries in attendance upon the occasion of their anniversaries except for those that were controlled by the Communists. Many new emerging countries in Asia and Africa have come forward since the historic Bandung Conference and others are scheduled for freedom this year and next.

Ceylon and the United States are both fortunate in having as the Ambassador from Ceylon to Washington one of the most influential men of the Diplomatic Corps. His Excellency, the Ambassador R. S. S. Gunewardene is admired but, more than that, is respected by all of us in our Nation's Capital. So, I begin my salute to Ceylon by wishing the very best for His Excellency, the Ambassador, and his charming wife. I know that as long as His Excellency, the Ambassador, is here the Government of Ceylon will be most ably represented.

May I also take this opportunity to congratulate His Excellency, the Governor General, Sir Oliver Goonetilleke. I have read very carefully the speech from the throne at the ceremonial opening of the Third Parliament of Ceylon and I would just like to refer to the Governor General's statement that his Government was taking all steps necessary to maintain law and order. They would also take measures required to restore peace, good will, and confidence amongst the various sections of the people of the country.

Finally, may I congratulate the Prime Minister, the Honorable S. W. R. D. Bandaranaike. I personally met the Prime Minister during his visit to the United States and he impressed me as he did all of us with his humility and his brilliance. It has been my pleasure to read extracts from the statements by him concerning the foreign policy of Ceylon.

We of the United States Congress trust that the relationships between our country and Ceylon, and beyond that, southeast Asia, shall continue to improve with a view toward a world of increasing peace and expanding democracy.

FORTY-NINE YEARS OF SCOUTING

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, from February 7 through 13 the Nation will observe Boy Scout Week. This organization which was founded in America 49 years ago this month is deserving of the attention and gratitude of all people who are concerned with the development of worthwhile citizens of the future. I know of no group which has more conscientiously and consistently over the years devoted itself to the teaching of patriotism, courage, and self-reliance to the youth of our country than the Boy Scouts of America.

The current 4-year program of the Boy Scouts has as its theme "Onward for God and My Country," and emphasizes that Scouts should prepare themselves to be citizens of character. The adoption of this slogan and the attendant programs to develop it is a clear statement of the highest ideals of scouting, expressing as it does the boy's obligation to God in his everyday living and his understanding of the democratic processes of government and their values through living and practicing them. These are no empty sentiments voiced merely to impress the boy and his family. The ideals of the Boy Scouts are realistic and practical and are based on the premise that only by instilling in the boy the desire to serve his God, his Country, and his fellow man can we hope to develop men who will have the moral fiber to meet the challenge of the world of tomorrow. The development of our youth to be physically strong, mentally awake, and morally straight is not just a desirable thing, but it is essential if America is to fulfill its mission as the leader of the free world. For only in a Nation made strong by the high moral and spiritual character of its citizens can we hope to effectively combat the atheism and disregard for individual human dignity of the Soviet Union. The work being done by the Boy Scouts of America in preparing our youth to meet the ever-increasing demands of world leadership cannot be overestimated.

The time and effort being given by leaders of industry and agriculture in the Second Congressional District of Kentucky to the Boy Scouts is quite gratifying, and as a result of the vigor of the scouting movement we have very little juvenile delinquency in my section of Kentucky. When recognition and encouragement are accorded a boy for worthwhile achievements, the bid for attention through acts of violence is rejected. I feel certain that as the Boy Scouts of America increase in number in a given community the incidence of juvenile delinquency will decrease proportionately in that community.

Mr. Speaker, an editorial, which, I believe, ably expresses the influence of the Boy Scout movement on our youth and thereby on our communities, appeared in the January 26 issue of the Messenger of Madisonville, Ky. The editorial entitled "Boy Scouts Approach 49th Birthday," is as follows:

BOY SCOUTS APPROACH 49TH BIRTHDAY

The Boy Scout movement has reached ripe middle age, and in our community and in thousands of others all over the Nation preparations are being made to observe Boy Scout Week, which will be from February 7 to 13, inclusive.

This will mark the 49th anniversary of the Boy Scouts, but we hasten to remark that passage of time has increased scouting's vigor, rather than diminishing it. Scouting is looking forward to ever-greater achievements and to an ever-expanding influence.

Here it should be tossed in that in an era when juvenile delinquency is much in the news, the achievements of Scouts are all the more notable, and deserve all the more support of responsible citizens who realize that the vast majority of the Nation's youth are fine, upstanding young people, interested in decent things and eager to share the responsibilities as well as the privileges of citizenship. Interested in decent things and well aware that citizenship in this good country of ours carries with it responsibilities as well as privileges.

In nearly a half-century of existence, the Scout organization has touched the lives of more than 28,500,000 Americans. Today there are more than 4,780,000 boys and leaders playing the game of scouting. This works out to one of every four boys in the 8 to 16-year-old groups, and the hope—and intention, too—is that this proportion will be materially increased.

Dr. Arthur A. Schuck, chief Scout executive, puts it this way:

"Looking ahead for the next 5 years we must recognize that never has it been so important or imperative that the youth of our Nation be trained to high idealism, acquired through unselfish service, by self-reliance and cooperative effort."

It should be noted that the ideals and objectives of scouting have remained unchanged since the movement's birth. Changes have been made, however, in organization methods and in operating techniques in order to meet the developing needs of the time.

Leaders in the movement tell us that at the moment, if scouting and its fine influences are to be brought to more of the boys who want it, there must be more trained leaders and more facilities, including camps.

Meeting this challenge from a proven organization which has done an incalculable amount of good in our community, State, and Nation should be regarded as a pleasure and a privilege, rather than as just another routine demand for community time and money.

The birthday of scouting is not far ahead. Getting the jump on the occasion, and at the same time reminding people of its approach, we say:

Happy birthday, Boy Scouts. And many happy returns thereof.

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR 5-YEAR EXTENSION OF THE AGRICULTURAL TRADE DEVELOPMENT AND ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1954

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. QUIE] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing an amendment to the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 which would extend the operation of this valuable surplus disposal program for 5 years.

This act, also known as Public Law 480, performs a great service to our country. It is at the same time the instrument by which we bolster our economy here at home through businesslike distribution of our surpluses abroad—and the means by which we discharge our obligation to our neighbor nations of the free world as the provider of food.

I am urging a 5-year extension of this essential farm program because I believe that the effectiveness of Public Law 480 is weakened if it lives by a virtual hour-by-hour existence, depending on frequent extensions by Congress.

The experience with the 85th Congress is a case in point. Last year the House of Representatives neglected to extend the program until the closing hours of the session—with the result that our long-range commitments were jeopardized. Foreign countries understandably did not know whether or not the United States would renew this act—and the negotiations suffered.

A clear-cut majority in both Houses has believed in the past that this act is of great value to our economy. I am sure that the overwhelming number of Members of Congress in this session believe the same thing. Then it is prudent and wise for us to extend this act for 5 years. Such an action would enhance the operation of the act and would have a good effect on the agricultural economy of our Nation—as well as our relations with countries we need to have on our side.

This amendment provides for continuation of the $1,500 million annual authorization for the program's operation—however it would allow the Department of Agriculture to obligate future years' authorizations in order to give a foreign government certainty of future delivery of our surplus commodities to satisfy their needs.

Mr. Speaker, for these reasons—and because Public Law 480 is directly related to our own economic self-interest—I urge consideration of this amendment.

DEFENSE CONTRACTS IN THE FLINT-LANSING AREA, MICHIGAN

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Speaker, I am all for the use of excellent metaphor in the press of the country. I am also convinced that some of the most telling characterizations in the prose of any language have been achieved by the comparison of individual human beings and groups of human beings to the purportedly lower bipeds—the animals. However, Mr. Speaker, these are only telling characterizations when they are suitable and accurate.

I refer specifically to the use of the words "hog" and "fat cats" with reference to the recipients of defense contracts in the Flint-Lansing area, which appeared in the Flint (Mich.) Journal on January 15 and the State Journal, of Lansing, Mich., on January 16, and carried by national wire service.

I also have no objection to the use of these unfortunate animal metaphors in somebody else's district, but when the odor of hogs and fat cats rubs off on the slim-pursed workers of the Sixth District of Michigan, I am going to employ some Airwick tactics to find out who is eating high on the hog, and where.

Because of general economic conditions last year in our district, unemployment reached a high of 24.3 percent in Flint in July and of 12.8 percent in Lansing in that same month. May I also point out that an announcement was made in Flint only last week that 2,250 additional Buick and Fisher Body plant workers would be laid off.

And, Mr. Speaker, let me also point out that during the period of the Korean war, July 1950 to June 1953, General Motors was first in the percentage of defense contracts. Today it is 17th. In the July 1950 to June 1953 period, General Motors had 6.8 percent of the total defense contracts awarded. Today it has 1.3 percent.

I can see no evidence here that defense contracts awarded to General Motors and its subsidiaries in our district have squeezed any other section of the country out of this source of employment, as has been alleged.

In fact, if there should be the suggested probe into the awarding of defense contracts, I believe the defense purchasing in the Sixth District of Michigan would come closer to its former 6.8 percent allotment.

I was disturbed by these allegations last week and wrote a letter to General Motors asking them for a statement on this situation. I am submitting for insertion in the RECORD my letter, their reply, and the two articles in the Lansing (Mich.) State Journal of January 16 and the Flint (Mich.) Journal of January 15 which gave rise to my concern:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., January 21, 1959.

Mr. JOHN F. GORDON,
President, General Motors Corp.,
Detroit, Mich.

DEAR MR. GORDON: Because of the many thousands of automobile workers throughout the Sixth Congressional District, which includes the cities of Flint and Lansing, I was quite disturbed about the enclosed newspaper clippings concerning General Motors' contracts with the Government.

I am sure the allegations which have been made that General Motors has received an unduly large proportion of defense contracts have been brought to your attention.

In the interest of the welfare of the many people who are employed directly in the automobile factories as well as the many businesses which are related to the automobile economy, I would appreciate your examining these news items and apprising me of the facts.

Thanking you for your courtesy, I am,
Sincerely,

CHARLES E. CHAMBERLAIN.

GENERAL MOTORS CORP.,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Detroit, Mich., January 29, 1959.

The Honorable CHARLES E. CHAMBERLAIN,
House of Representatives,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Thank you for your letter of January 21 and the newspaper clipping concerning allegations about defense contract awards to General Motors. I am glad to give you the facts which you request.

As to our position in defense production awards, the Department of Defense periodically publishes analyses of contract awards to the 100 largest defense contractors, showing the ranking of the contractor based on value of award, the value, and the percentage that value is of U.S. total awards.

Data regarding General Motors for the July 1950 to June 1958 period are shown in the following tabulation. It should be pointed out that the total dollar amounts of prime contract awards and the percent of these totals awarded to General Motors represent net value of new procurement actions minus cancellations, terminations and other credit transactions.

Period	Department of Defense prime contract awards (in millions)	Percent of total awarded to General Motors	General Motors position
July 1950 to June 1953	$98,229	6.8	1
July 1953 to December 1954	16,492	[1] (.4)	--------
January 1955 to June 1956	25,637	1.3	14
July 1956 to June 1957	18,954	1.4	12
July 1957 to June 1958	21,795	1.3	17

[1] Cancellations and terminations were in excess of new awards.

As shown in these reports, during the period of the Korean war when the country was urgently in need of great quantities of war materials (July 1950 through June 1953) General Motors ranked first in prime contract awards, having received 6.8 percent of total U.S. awards. However, during the first 18 months after the cease-fire in Korea (July 1953 through December 1954), General Motors was not included in the first 100 companies. In fact, as the tabulation shows, cancellations and terminations more than offset new awards to General Motors during this period.

Subsequently, during periods more representative of peacetime procurement programs, General Motors' position as a defense contractor has ranged between 12th and 17th, the latter being our position for the 12 months ended June 30, 1958, the latest Government fiscal year for which data are available.

You may also be interested in knowing that General Motors defense sales for the last 3 years, 1956 through 1958, have amounted to about 5 percent of our total sales. This is only about one-third as great as in the 3-year period 1951 through 1953 when deliveries of war materials were being made for the Korean war emergency.

It might be pointed out, too, that during the Korean emergency important General Motors defense production operations were located in Lansing and Flint. Today Lansing has no defense work at all, and the amount being done in Flint is minor.

I trust that the foregoing will give you the desired information.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN F. GORDON.

HOOSIER WANTS PROBE OF GM ROLE IN DEFENSE BUYING

WASHINGTON.—An Indiana Congressman says he wants to find out why General Motors is able to hog the defense-buying market.

Representative RAY J. MADDEN, Indiana Democrat, said Wednesday the Defense Department is nothing more than a branch of General Motors as far as contracts are concerned.

MADDEN said he expected the House Armed Services Committee to delve into defense buying.

"The trouble is," said MADDEN, "the fat cats are getting fatter and smaller concerns like Studebaker in my district are being disregarded entirely."

MADDEN is a member of the House Rules Committee. Wednesday the committee approved a resolution continuing the Armed Service Committee's authority to investigate military-procurement policies. The resolution goes before the House today.

MADDEN said the Rules Committee was assured by Chairman CARL VINSON, Georgia Democrat, of the Armed Services Committee that defense purchasing would be investigated fully.

The Hoosier said GM's share of the military market increased sharply while Charles E. Wilson, former GM president, was Secretary of Defense.

Studebaker "still hasn't recovered from being squeezed out of the market," MADDEN said.

GM DEFENSE SHARE HIT—INDIANA LAWMAKER SAYS FIRM "HOGS" CONTRACTS; HINTS A PROBE

WASHINGTON, January 16.—An Indiana Congressman says he wants to find out why General Motors is able "to hog" the defense buying market.

Representative RAY J. MADDEN (Democrat, Indiana) said Wednesday the Defense Department "is nothing more than a branch of General Motors as far as contracts are concerned."

MADDEN said he expected the House Armed Services Committee to delve into defense buying.

"The trouble is," said MADDEN, "the fat cats are getting fatter and smaller concerns like Studebaker in my district are being disregarded entirely."

MADDEN is a member of the House Rules Committee. Wednesday the committee approved a resolution continuing the Armed Services Committee's authority to investigate military procurement policies. The resolution was to appear before the full House today.

MADDEN said the Rules Committee was assured by Chairman CARL VINSON (Democrat, Georgia), of the Armed Services Committee that defense purchasing would be investigated fully.

The Indianian said G.M.'s share of the military market increased sharply while Charles E. Wilson, former G.M. president, was Secretary of Defense.

Studebaker "still hasn't recovered from being squeezed out of the market," MADDEN said.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Tribute to Hon. Richard B. Russell, of Georgia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERMAN E. TALMADGE

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, February 4, 1959

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the text of remarks on January 30, 1959, by the Honorable JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, Member of Congress from the 20th District of Pennsylvania, in presenting to the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] the annual Minute Man of the Year Award of the Reserve Officers Association of the United States.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY REPRESENTATIVE JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, 20TH DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA, JANUARY 30, 1959, IN PRESENTING U.S. SENATOR RICHARD B. RUSSELL, OF GEORGIA, THE ANNUAL CITATION BY THE RESERVE OFFICERS ASSOCIATION AS MAN OF THE YEAR FOR 1959

It is a signal honor to have been selected to present the Reserve Officers' Association annual citation to the citizen who has contributed most to national security in these times.

The recipient of this year's award is a distinguished Member of the U.S. Senate, and since it is the habit in Congress to rely upon the Congressional Directory for background information, it is interesting to observe that the recipient of the award is recorded in the pages of the directory listing Senators as follows:

"RICHARD BREVARD RUSSELL, Democrat, of Winder, Ga."

This is the sole reference from a biographical standpoint to one of the most able and popular Members of the U.S. Senate.

Even though his biographical sketch is the personification of brevity, Senator RUSSELL's official activities embrace chairman of the Senate Committee on the Armed Services, and membership on the powerful Senate Committee on Appropriations.

He is also a member of the congressional Joint Committee on Atomic Energy and, in addition, is serving as a member of the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy, the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy, and the Board of Visitors to the Air Force Academy.

The resolution selecting Senator RICHARD B. RUSSELL for this annual citation describes him in a manner in keeping with his worthwhile contributions to our national defense.

The resolution that accompanies the citation reads as follows:

"Reserve Officers Association of the United States annual citation to the citizen who has contributed most to national security in these times: 1959, RICHARD BREVARD RUSSELL.

"An association resolution: To the Honorable RICHARD BREVARD RUSSELL, because throughout your career you have been—

"(a) Profoundly aware of the obligation of every citizen to service to his nation, and by continuing precept and example aided in keeping alive this vital tradition;

"(b) Broadly knowledgeable in history and motivations of peoples and nations of the world, you have exercised a genius for leadership critically contributing to this Nation's victories in wars;

"(c) Nobly motivated in your public service, you have shunned narow considerations, including partisanship, but rather have fixed your course and your influence toward highest standards of national interest;

"(d) Deeply dedicated to honor and duty, you have given of your strength and genius far beyond and above the call of both honor and duty.

"In the name of this Nation's first Minutemen, who gave our forefathers the inspiration and instinct to contest to the death for their liberty, this association proudly recognizes your service as a patriot, and its meaningful contribution to the national security shared by every citizen of the United States in these times.

"For the association—by the National Executive Committee, Washington, D.C., January 30, 1959.

"(Signed) Rear Adm. Leon J. Jacobi, USNR, National President, Detroit; and Col. John T. Carlton, USAR, Executive Director, Washington."

Senator RUSSELL—or DICK as you are known to your thousands of friends—it gives me great pleasure to present you with the Reserve Officers Association award of Man of the Year for 1959, and with it I extend my sincere congratulations.

Hon. Louis B. Heller

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 4, 1959

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following remarks made at the induction ceremonies of our former colleague, Hon. Louis B. Heller, who was inducted as a justice of the city court of New York at the Central Courts Building, Brooklyn, on January 6, 1959. Hon. Nathan R. Sobel of the county court of Kings County presided at the ceremonies:

Judge SOBEL. May I invite the newly elected justice of the city court, the Honorable Louis B. Heller, to enter the courtroom.

(Judge Heller enters. Applause.)

Judge SOBEL. May I introduce Rabbi Baumol, Judge Heller's rabbi, who will deliver the invocation.

(Rabbi Baumol delivers invocation.)

Judge SOBEL. Judge Heller has requested that these proceedings be kept as informal as possible. We have had requests from many of his dear friends and associates in the courts, as well as the legislature and Congress, to speak. We have explained to them that we shall curtail the speechmaking and make their presence known so that they may briefly congratulate the newly elected justice.

Before calling on the speakers, I should like to introduce to you Mrs. Ruth Heller, the judge's charming wife, who has so understandingly cooperated with him in his work over the years.

(Presentation of flowers by the officers of the court.)

Judge SOBEL. I should like also to introduce his very lovely daughter, Marcia.

His son Bobby, who was present at the formal swearing-in last week, returned yesterday to Bucknell University, and the judge has just whispered in my ear that he is cramming, as we all used to do, for his final exams.

I should like to introduce for a bow his lifelong partner and associate in the practice of law, his devoted brother Harry, who has been by his side during many trying years.

There are so many of Louis Heller's old friends here, even his childhood and boyhood friends, that I must, without selecting any particular one or group, mention that included in the group, sitting in the audience, are 22 members of the class of June 1922, of Boys High School. This is a class which has great historical significance to Boys High because it was the only class in the history of this country, I think, which captured all of the State scholarships, all of the Cornell scholarships, and all of the Harvard scholarships, and, indeed, all of the other scholarships offered throughout the country, all in one class, in one school, and in one particular year.

We had a great many geniuses among them, geniuses in the medical profession who have proved themselves, in business, in the other professions, and, of course, least of all are the geniuses who ascended the bench. I see present one of them, Judge Keogh of the supreme court, and Judge DiGiovanna of the supreme court, also a member of the class, and, of course, Judge Starke and Judge Schor are present here, and a great many members of the legislature, and least of all, myself.

My friendship with Louis goes back even much before the time we attended high school. We knew each other when we attended elementary school.

The following addressed the meeting:

Francis Verilli, Esq., the president of the Brooklyn Bar Association.

Albert Gondelman, Esq., chairman of the city court committee of the Brooklyn Bar Association.

Judge Joseph A. Solovei, who presented a scroll on behalf of the Kings County Criminal Bar Association, which reads as follows:

"The Kings County Criminal Bar Association presents this plaque to Hon. Louis B. Heller, justice of the city court of the city of New York, for his distinguished services as a lawyer and judge, his warmhearted concern for his fellow man and counsel to the bench and bar."

Gilbert S. Rosenthal, Esq., president of the Association of Lawyers of the Criminal Courts of Manhattan, also presented a scroll, which reads as follows:

"The Association of Lawyers of the Criminal Courts of Manhattan extend to Judge Louis B. Heller the heartiest congratulations and best wishes on his appointment to a higher court. For many years Judge Heller served the city and State of New York with pride and distinction. His untiring efforts, wise counsel and vast experience have done much to further the cause of justice. We, who practice in the criminal courts, indeed regret to see him go but are happy that his new appointment reflects a job well done. May he continue his dedicated work for many years in the best of health."

Morris Himmelfarb, Esq., representing the Queens County Criminal Bar Association.

Judge Heller, as you know, has held many public offices. I know you recall that he served for more than 10 years on the executive committee of the Democratic Party of Kings County.

I should like to introduce for a bow at this time the Honorable Joseph T. Sharkey, majority leader of the city council and chairman of the executive committee of the Democratic Party of Kings County.

I should also like to note the presence of Judge Heller's former associates of this committee; the Honorable James V. Mangano, general clerk of the Supreme Court of Kings County, who had the distinction of opening the ceremonies on yesterday commemorating the dedication of the new supreme court building; Hon. John Cashmore, borough president of Brooklyn and former chairman of the Kings County Democratic organization; Hon. Jack Weinberg; Hon. Harry M. Mortimer; Hon. Ross J. DiLorenzo; Dr. Joshua H. Friedman; Hon. Frank A. Nolan, commissioner of borough works; Hon. Joseph B. Whitty, county clerk; Hon. Frank A. Cunningham, Jr., chief clerk of the appellate term; Hon. Harry Morr, deputy fire commissioner; Hon. James M. Power, commissioner of the board of elections; Hon. Albert M. Leavitt, chief clerk of the surrogates court, Kings County; Hon. Vincent P. Carney, former motor vehicle commissioner; Councilman Edward Vogel; Assemblyman Stanley Steingut; Hon. John A. Valente, deputy markets commissioner; and Hon. Alexander G. Hesterberg, tax commissioner—all State committeemen associated with Judge Heller in many of his activities.

I can see many co-leaders present, but I must be pardoned if I do not call out their names, and in lieu thereof I shall read the following telegram by Victoria Rapps, chairman of the co-leaders executive committee.

"On behalf of the Democratic Co-leaders of Kings County, I congratulate you and I wish for you and your family good health, and many happy years in judicial life."

I shall also read an excerpt from a message from a former associate of Judge Heller in the legislature, the Honorable Robert F. Wagner, mayor of the city of New York. He says:

"Regret exceedingly that official business makes it impossible for me to be with you on the occasion of your induction as a justice of the city court. I am pleased to join with all of your friends in congratulating you for you have done so much to help make our city a better place in which to live."

Present in spirit is the lifelong friend of Judge Heller, the president of the city council, Hon. Abe Stark. I shall read only part of his message.

"Your constructive record in Congress and on the bench naturally endow you for this new responsibility. I am confident that the city court will be enriched by your demonstrated talent in the realm of judicial affairs."

As you are all aware, the legislature has convened this morning for its first session of the year 1959. Present, however, are a great many members of the legislature who are taking early trains to Albany. They insisted on staying for these ceremonies. I regret that I am unable to call on all of them, but I should like to have the senior delegate from Brooklyn, the Honorable Bernard Austin, speak for the members of the assembly.

(Assemblyman Austin spoke briefly.)

Judge SOBEL. I should also like to have Senator William Rosenblatt speak for the members of the senate.

(Senator Rosenblatt spoke briefly.)

Judge SOBEL. The attorney general of the State of New York, the Honorable Louis Lefkowitz, is detained in Albany, and has sent the following message:

"It has been my privilege to be a friend of Louis Heller for many, many years. Blessed with innate wisdom and unexcelled integrity, Louis not only has gained an enviable record in public service but by his sincerity and consideration of others, he has earned the regard and love of all with whom he has come into contact. I am confident that Louis Heller will add immeasurably to the city court's proud record of achievement."

As all of you know, Louis has served for several terms with great distinction in the House of Representatives. As you have no doubt read in the newspapers, the House is organizing this morning and since there is a controversial matter before it concerning the increase in the membership of the powerful House Rules Committee, many of his former colleagues who had planned to be here have been unable to attend.

I have too many messages to read, hence permit me to read excerpts from only a few and then mention the names of his colleagues, whose messages I hold in my hand.

From the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, Speaker of the House:

"I want to congratulate you as you begin a splendid career as city court justice and extend to you my kindest wishes for a long life of useful service to your people."

From Hon. JOHN W. MCCORMACK, Massachusetts, the majority leader:

"Dear Louis, I regret very much official business in Washington prevents my being with you and your many friends when you are sworn in. While I have missed you here I extend to you my hearty congratulations and very best wishes for every happiness and success in your new position and field of great responsibility."

From Hon. CARL ALBERT, Oklahoma, Democratic whip:

"It is really marvelous to know that such a good friend is getting along so well. We certainly miss you in Washington. Come to see us."

Now, from the Senate side, may I read the following excerpts:

From the Honorable JACOB K. JAVITS, senior Senator from New York:

"My warmest congratulations on this auspicious occasion. Your new appointment reflects the great pride and confidence of your colleagues and associates in your ability and the integrity of your actions. Please accept my every good wish for success."

From the Honorable KENNETH KEATING, newly elected and now junior Senator from New York:

"Warmest greetings as you begin your new duties as city court justice. I know you will bring dignity and judgment to your new post and I wish you every success and happiness in the years ahead."

From a very warm and dear friend of Lou's, the Honorable JOHN F. KENNEDY, Senator from Massachusetts:

"Warmest congratulations on the occasion of your taking over your new position as court justice. I am delighted that you have received this important judicial recognition and that you'll continue to serve the New York community with eminence. With every good wish."

From the Honorable MIKE MANSFIELD, Montana, majority whip of the Senate, and a member of the powerful Foreign Affairs Committee:

"Dear Louis, congratulations. I know that New York will be well repaid on the basis of your ability, integrity and understanding in the position you are assuming. On behalf of your many friends in both Houses, as well as my own, I wish to extend to you good luck and success in the years ahead. You have been a great public servant and your contributions to the public good will be your monument in life. With best personal wishes, I am, sincerely yours."

And this telegram is a must. It is from the Honorable STEPHEN M. YOUNG, who formerly served in the House with Louis, and last November upset all predictions by becoming the junior Senator from the great State of Ohio:

"Lou Heller is a truly great public servant and a real friend to any of us. As a former colleague of his in the Congress of the United States, I congratulate the people of New York on his induction as justice of your courts. I extend to him my sincere personal greetings and regards with the full knowledge that this is but a continuation of a great career in public service."

Other Members of the House of Representatives who served with Judge Heller and who sent messages are: Hon. JOHN J. ROONEY, Hon. ABE MULTER, Hon. ISIDORE DOLLINGER, Hon. JOHN B. BENNETT, Hon. HERBERT ZELENKO, Hon. OREN HARRIS, Hon. PETER W. RODINO, Jr., Hon. PAUL A. FINO, Hon. LESTER HOLTZMAN, and Hon. EUGENE KEOGH.

Only yesterday I received a telephone call from the dean of the Kings County delegation in the House. He is, of course, the Honorable EMANUEL CELLER, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. Congressman CELLER is a close and dear personal friend of Judge Heller and, indeed, of all of us. We, in Brooklyn, are particularly proud of our Congressman, because we feel he has made the greatest contribution to the welfare of the people of the United States in the many years he has served as chairman of that powerful committee. We particularly emphasize his magnificent achievement in the field of antitrust and antimonopoly legislation.

Congressman CELLER phoned in a warm message. He asked me to state that he has been made very happy, Judge Heller, because your ambitions are being realized. He is certain that you will bring to bear upon your work in the city court the fine qualities you exemplified in the Congress of the United States.

Seated at the bench next to Louis is the chief justice of the city court, the Honorable Peter A. Quinn, who has had a distinguished career in the legislature and in Congress, and who now graces one of the finest courts of our city. Both have been colleagues but now Peter is going to be Lou's chief, and a finer chief Lou knows he could never have. He will soon address you.

Present are almost all of the justices of the court of special sessions. They all desire to say a few words. However, the limitations of time make it impossible for us to complete these proceedings and yet hear from all of them.

Seated with us on the bench is the president-justice of the court of special sessions, the Honorable Irving Ben Cooper, a very dear friend of Lou's. And also our very dear friend, the Honorable Vincent Impellitteri, a member of the court and the former mayor of the city of New York. We want to express our appreciation to Justices Cannella, Galloway, Cawse, Gassman, Rossbach, Acquavella, Silver, Loscalzo, Byrne, Dunaif, Ringel, and Thompson, who traveled from the outlying boroughs to visit with Judge Heller this morning.

I should also like to note the presence of former Justice Louis I. Kaplan, now the commissioner of investigation of the city of New York.

Also present are his new colleagues of the city court of Kings County, Justices Sabbatino, Feidem, Wecht, and Low, as well as many of Judge Heller's new associates of this court from the other counties.

I also note the presence of many judges of the domestic relations court, including Judges Lorence, Marchisio, Kaplan, Ruisi, Ramsgate, and Pagnucco.

And from the municipal court, all friends of Lou's, Judges Alter, Williams, Berry, Rinaldi, Simon, Andreozzi, Johnson, Pearlman, and Damiani.

And from the magistrates court, I must salute Judges Chapman, Solomon, Potter, Maglio, Rader, Tolleris, Gray, Schanzer, Fagan, Serper, Ohringer, Malbin, Livoti, Wallach, Glowa, and Cullen.

I am acting as chairman on this occasion only by sufferance. We had expected that Chief Judge Conway's duties would permit him to attend and preside over these ceremonies. Unfortunately, this was not to be, but I have here a very warm telegram from the chief judge to the new justice. It reads:

"I send you every good wish for health and happiness in your further service to the people of our city as city court justice."

The District Attorney's Association is holding its annual convention in California, a much more pleasant, and I am sure, warmer place than Brooklyn is today. District Attorney Silver has sent his chief assistant, the Honorable Kenneth McCabe, who will address you later.

The Honorable Frank Hogan, who is also on vacation, has deputized one of his chief assistants, the Honorable Anthony Leibler, who will also address you.

Frank O'Connor, the district attorney of Queens County, phoned in a warm message just a few minutes ago.

Most of the justices of the supreme court from Kings County are with us. Mr. Justice Anthony DiGiovanni, the chairman of the board of justices, will speak on their behalf.

But I cannot permit this occasion to pass without asking Mr. Justice J. Vincent Keogh, a lifelong friend and classmate of both Judge Heller and myself, to stand up and take a bow.

I should like to have Mr. Justice Arthur Klein, of New York County, a colleague of Judge Heller in Congress, to stand up and take a bow.

It is also my privilege to introduce the Honorable Ferdinand Pecora, former justice of the supreme court of New York County. [Applause.] I know your applause would be even more resounding, if that were possible, if you knew that Judge Pecora is celebrating today his 77th birthday. You will soon hear from him.

I should also like to note the presence of the surrogate of Kings County, the Honorable Maxmillian MOES, who will speak, and also the Honorable Samuel DiFalco, surrogate of New York County, who asks leave to return to a motion calendar which was scheduled for early this morning. [Applause.]

Present also with us on this occasion is the Honorable Henry Ughetta, justice of the appellate division of the second department, who brings with him the greetings and good wishes of all of his associates in this department, and who, I am sure, will want to say a few words.

Similar messages have been sent by the Honorable George J. Beldock, a lifelong friend of Lou's, and now a justice of the appellate division of the supreme court. Also from the Honorable Leo F. Rayfiel, judge of the United States District Court, Eastern District of New York, who served in the legislature with our distinguished guest. And another from the Honorable David N. Edelstein, a judge of the United States District Court of the Southern District of New York. And I hold in my hand a very warm message from the lovable John MacCrate, a former justice of the appellate division.

This completes the list of public officials present here with us today within my immediate view. I am sure I have been unable to spot them all in this crowded courtroom, but I hope that those whom I haven't mentioned will forgive me.

Present also are many of Louis' very old friends from his childhood, boyhood, and schooldays. It is obviously impossible for me to mention all of them. I must, however, note the presence in the courtroom of one of his dearest friends and his guiding mentor through all the years of his public life. I should like the commissioner of jurors from the eastern division of New York, the Honorable "Moish" Solomon, to take a bow.

Lou wishes me to state that he has received a very warm message from one whom he holds in very high esteem, but for the fact that he is out of the State he would have been here with us. I refer to Mr. Morris Forgash, president of the United States Freight Co.

And from some other friends, Jerry Wurf, regional director, State, County and Municipal Employees; the Honorable Charles R. Howell, commissioner of the department of banking and insurance of the State of New Jersey; and Arnold E. Feldman, attorney-adviser at the U.S. Military Academy, West Point, N.Y.

I should like to introduce also for a bow, some very, very dear friends of the new justice: First, the Honorable Meier Steinbrink, former justice of the supreme court; also Al Kevelson, Eddie Zeltner, of the Mirror; Harold Harris of the Journal; Geane Toomey of the Telegram-Sun; and Al Turk of the Journal-American.

I have hundred telegrams, letters, and messages in my hand that I cannot possibly wade through now, hence I will order that they may be made part of the official record and turned over to the judge.

As you know, we have used Judge Barshay's courtroom, which is the largest in this building, and Lou and I wish to thank him for his generosity. Unfortunately, he is home ill, otherwise he would have been present.

And, of course, I cannot forget my own colleagues who are present, Judges Marasco and Starkey.

And also from the court of general sessions, Lou's former colleague, Judge Culkin. Also Judges Geller and Schweitzer.

My next duty is to convey a message from Mrs. Heller. She has asked me to invite each and every one of you to participate in a collation in the courtroom of the new justice of the city court on the 10th floor at the conclusion of these proceedings. I hope eoch and every one of you will accept that most cordial invitation.

(The ceremonies were brought to an abrupt end by the sudden illness and death of Assemblyman Bernard Austin.)

German Embargo of American Coal

OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 4, 1959

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, suddenly, on January 23, 1959, Germany unilaterally and in violation of her coal and steel treaty with other European nations, placed a tariff of $4.76 a ton on foreign coal. This practically was an embargo and was aimed at the United States, which normally ships over 16 million tons of coal per year to Germany. Not only was this action in violation of Germany's Coal and Steel Community treaty, but I suggest that it was in violation of another treaty, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade—GATT—of which the United States is a member, forbidding bilateral or group agreements by members of GATT without the unanimous consent of all nations concerned. So sudden was Germany's unilateral action that even our State Department, which had been negotiating with the Bonn government since last September, was taken by surprise. The other day when our Government made a last minute request for a 60-day delay in the German action, it was brushed aside and the rash decision of the German Government was rushed through the Bundestag for formal approval.

Where does this leave American mining and shipping interests? Many American miners will be forced out of work because this huge hike in German coal duties will make prohibitive the importation of American coal to Germany. The $4.76 per ton will raise the price of American coal far above Ruhr coal. This hike, as I noted, came like a bolt from the blue. No warning, no advance notice, and no way of cushioning the blow. American coal miners in Virginia, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Tennessee, and other States will be faced with continued idleness. Already West Virginia, which supplies more than 50 percent of the Nation's annual output of coal, has the highest percent of its labor force unemployed. Starvation and want stalk its hills and that situation will be exacerbated by the rigors of the cold winter. Based on 1957 figures, Germany's action involves a loss of 500,000 days' work to coal miners.

American shippers have contracts to purchase this coal as mined, and have in turn chartered ships for transportation and are under obligation to deliver coal to German importers. Germany's action will make these contracts virtually impossible of performance. These people are well on their way to suffering immeasurable damages. Charter fees run into the millions. Damages in other respects are inordinate. More than 30 million tons of U.S. coal still are on order. With a $4.76-a-ton tariff staring them in the face—a tariff which, by action of the Bonn government was made retroactive to January 1 of this year—many American exporters face bankruptcy. Thus coal in transit is affected.

The Bonn government seeks to justify this drastic action on the grounds that it is an economic move designed to rescue the Ruhr coal industry from its year-old doldrums. This is somewhat hard to believe when it is remembered that Germany was in real need of American coal in 1957 in order to maintain at that time its strong domestic economy. The facts indicate that her move is not based on economic need; rather it is political. Having fully recovered from World War II, Germany is once again becoming industrially aggressive and is seeking to change the whole distribution of coal in Europe. And being the dominant power of the nations which comprise the European Coal and Steel Community, she can force her arbitrary action upon her weaker neighbors. I seriously question the right of Germany to impose these drastic tariff duties. It is morally indefensible.

Be that as it may, in the absence of diplomatic negotiations, which appear at this time to be inadequate, what remedies do American producers and shippers have? Germany's action, though arbitrary, is not a case in law which could be classified as a "force majeure" or confiscation, so that businessmen who suffer, may recoup damages from the government. It may be that they could sue the individual German importers of coal; but this would take much time and involve insurmountable difficulties.

Meanwhile, what?

It seems anomalous at a time when the United States is responding to the requests to rescue West Germany, particularly as to the status of Berlin, that the Bonn government would so heedlessly injure American shippers and producers. It certainly does not make for pleasant or cordial relations between the United States and the West German Government. On the contrary, it shows a country willing to accept advantages and display no gratitude. Nay, more, it is symbolic of utter apathy on the part of West German rulers as to the interest of American citizens who are or will have to continue to ship coal to Germany.

I have been a friend to Germany, but this latest maneuver has tinctured that friendship.

It is incumbent on West Germany forthwith to come forward with some remedy, otherwise there will be agitation in and out of Congress to retaliate. Raising duties without rhyme or reason will bring in its trail ever-increasing American duties against German manufactured goods. The thrust will be given where it hurts Germany the most.

Urban Renewal Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 4, 1959

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter I received from Honorable John B. Hynes, mayor of the city of Boston, Mass., relating to urban renewal legislation, together with copy of my reply to him:

CITY OF BOSTON,
OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
January 30, 1959.

Hon. JOHN W. McCORMACK,
House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Urban renewal legislation is pending before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. Both of the mayors organizations, the U.S. Conference of Mayors, and the American Municipal Association, are heartily in favor of a bill which would provide for a 10-year urban renewal program with the Federal Government appropriating $600 million each year and the local communities providing the usual one-third or even a 20 percent share.

As you know, the administration bill is for $250 million a year for 3 years and $200 million for the following 3 years. This simply will not do the job that must be done. In addition, the requirement in the administration bill that cities share on a matching 50–50 basis will be the death knell to the urban renewal program, for cities simply cannot contribute that much to this most necessary program.

The U.S. Conference of Mayors, and through its president, Hon. Norris Poulson, mayor of Los Angeles, has placed its case before the committee on January 26. I am in accord with everything that Mayor Poulson said at that time because it reflects the unanimous opinion of the mayors throughout the country.

I will appreciate if you will keep your eye on this legislation and help wherever you can. I know that you are interested in the continuation of urban renewal on a sensible scale and in a sensible manner and I know also that you hardly need to be asked to help.

With best wishes, I am,

Respectfully,

JOHN HYNES, Mayor.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., February 4, 1959.

Hon. JOHN B. HYNES,
City Hall, Boston, Mass.

DEAR JOHN: I am in receipt of your letter of January 30 and in reply will say that the President's recommendation in relation to urban renewal legislation is completely inadequate.

I am having your letter inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. MCCORMACK.

National Defense Student Loan Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN V. LINDSAY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 4, 1959

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to comment upon a program which has significance for the young people of this Nation and for the strength of the Nation itself. I refer to the national defense student loan program authorized by Public Law 864, enacted by the 85th Congress in its closing days and signed into law by the President on September 2.

The national defense student loan program provides for the establishment, at institutions of higher education throughout the Nation, of loan funds from which needy students may borrow funds for the completion of their education at low interest rates and on generous repayment terms. Its objective is to encourage needy students to continue their educational pursuits, an objective contemplated in several features of this act. The Congress is authorized to appropriate $295 million for this purpose during the next 4 years. The assistance and encouragement that this program can and will offer to needy young people throughout the country is immense. It should do much to reduce the waste of talent which has resulted from the failure of able but needy students to continue with their educational plans.

President Eisenhower signed the National Defense Education Act into law on September 2, 1958. I have followed the progress that has been made by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in implementing this program. I believe that the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Dr. Arthur S. Flemming, and the U.S. Commissioner of Education, Dr. Lawrence G. Derthick, are to be complimented upon the prompt and sound manner in which they have undertaken the implementation of all programs authorized by the National Defense Education Act. This is a new era of departmental responsibility and they have measured up to the challenge. They are to be complimented upon the appointment of Dr. Homer D. Babbidge, Jr., to head the administration of those programs affecting American higher education. It has been my pleasure to work with Dr. Babbidge in various capacities over the years, and I am confident that he will lend able and imaginative leadership to the administration of these programs.

It is a particular source of pride to me that officials of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare have selected to administer the national defense student loan program a resident of the State of New York, and a prominent official of the State university of New York, Mr. Peter P. Muirhead. Mr. Muirhead has for many years served as director of the New York State regents scholarship and examination program. He served as executive secretary of the New York Higher Education Assistant Corporation, which was responsible for the establishment of New York State's successful student loan program. Mr. Muirhead is a man of experience and wisdom, and in entrusting to him the responsibility for the administration of this program, the Department has insured that the program will be administered soundly and well. Mr. Muirhead's appointment to this post was made possible only through the cooperation of Dr. James S. Allen, Jr., commissioner of education for the State of New York. Dr. Allen's willingness to lend to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare a key member of his own staff is a splendid example of effective Federal-State cooperation. It is an example of the constructive concept of partnership which has been stressed so much by the President and other administration leaders, as the key to effective progress in the field of education.

Mr. Speaker, the national defense student loan program authorized by the 85th Congress is a well-conceived program. It is secure in the hands of able educators and administrators. I am confident that it will do much for the young people of our Nation, and therefore for the Nation as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, I have one concern regarding the effective implementation of this program; and this has to do with the amounts of money available for this purpose. As I indicated earlier, the act authorizes the appropriation of sums up to $295 million during the next 4 years. For this, the first year of the loan program, a total of $47½ million is authorized. The respective Appropriations Committees of the House and the Senate, under pressure to act on an appropriations request during the closing hours of the 85th Congress, effected an interim, or stopgap, appropriation for this purpose of only $6 million. This was done with the clear understanding that the Appropriations Committees would reconsider at the earliest opportunity a supplemental request for this and other purposes. I trust and hope that this body will see to it that the additional funds in substantial quantity are made available at the earliest possible opportunity.

Let me suggest the importance of prompt action on a supplemental request for the purposes of the National Defense Education Act. Taking the student loan program by itself, let me indicate how inadequate a figure of $6 million is.

The most recent figures show that 92 institutions in the State of New York have applied for funds under the loan program, and these institutions represent more than 167,000 full-time students. The total amount requested by New York State schools is approximately $7 million. In my home city of New York alone, 28 institutions, representing more than 71,000 full-time students, have applied for Federal funds under this program. Under the State allotment formula embodied in this act, the State of New York would be entitled to only $623,442. If the initial stopgap appropriation of $6 million were not increased this sum would not begin to meet the needs of New York City institutions alone. This sum would not meet one-tenth of the current student loan needs of institutions of higher education in the State of New York. Failure to provide additional funds under this program, therefore, would work a hardship upon the young people of the State of New York and upon the institutions which they are attending. I urge, Mr. Speaker, that the leadership of this body give prompt and positive attention to this critical need.

I am confident that President Eisenhower will forward to the Congress a request for supplementary funds with which to implement the national defense student loan program. I know that Secretary Flemming and Commissioner Derthick are well aware of the urgent need for additional funds for this purpose. Certainly the colleges and universities of the Nation know how pitifully inadequate $6 million is for this purpose. The young people of the Nation and their parents have made perfectly clear how urgently they need this assistance. It now rests squarely upon this Congress to respond promptly and positively to a need identified and endorsed by the entire Nation.

Progress in High Fidelity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 4, 1959

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, like other Members of the House, I have been gratified of late to observe the marked progress which our Nation is making in the field of electronics. Components of the electronic industry are located in my own district, and I have had a special opportunity to observe the rapid changes and advances which are taking place in this great industry which so well serves the American people and our armed services. There are many facets to the marvels of electronic development which are currently transforming and vastly improving our communication systems, our sound reproduction media and automatic guidance and control systems and truly revolutionizing our industrial methods, weapon systems, and in fact, the reproduction instrumentalities that we use so frequently in our homes and in our daily lives.

I was very much impressed recently with the progress in the electronic field evidenced by demonstrations and exhibits presented as a prelude to the High Fidelity Festival being held in Washington this weak. The initial event of the program last Saturday night in which the Washington National Symphony Orchestra participated before a large audience was a most convincing testimony of the great advances made in recent years in the electronic reproduction of sound.

Some 2,500 music lovers thought they were hearing trumpeter Lloyd Geisler during the solo portion of Purcell's "Trumpet Voluntary." Actually, he was simply going through the motions of playing while the audience was listening to a recording he had made on tape earlier in the day. Reproducing this recording for the audience were high-fidelity amplifiers and speakers such as are found in many homes today for the faithful reproduction of recorded sound.

To complete the illusion, a second rendition of the Purcell composition was given. This time the orchestra on stage remained silent while trumpeter Geisler played to the accompaniment of a recording made by the National Symphony earlier.

This demonstration of the new great advances made in sound reproduction, which is called stereophonic sound, was the opening event of the 4-day International High Fidelity Music Festival, which begins this Thursday, February 5, at the Hotel Shoreham.

An exhibition area, comprising some 50 rooms, has been set aside at the Shoreham where more than 250 different items of high-fidelity equipment for the home will be shown, including phonograph records, amplifiers, speakers, radio tuners, tape recorders, turntables, and other music reproduction products.

This is not Washington's first high-fidelity music show. Last year's showing attracted some 16,000 visitors to the Shoreham. This year's music festival, however, marks the first time that a nationally known symphonic group participates actively in an exhibit of this kind.

Other cities such as Los Angeles, Chicago, and New York have very successful high fidelity shows, which attract thousands of visitors. This week's music festival in Washington, however, brings together our great National Symphony and the newest in sound reproducing equipment in an association which may be the start of a musical trend for other parts of the country.

I hope that some of my colleagues in the House will have the chance to visit the International High Fidelity Music Festival during this weekend at the Shoreham. An exciting experience is in store for them as it is for everyone who hears stereophonic sound for the first time. At the same time, they may gain firsthand knowledge of woofers, tweeters, crossover networks and other equipment dear to the heart of the high fidelity devotee.

I would be remiss if I do not bring to the attention of my colleagues three exhibitors from Massachusetts: the H. H. Scott Co. of Maynard, which is in my district; High Fidelity magazine of Great Barrington; and Acoustic Research of Cambridge.

The H. H. Scott exhibit should be of particular interest because the products of this company are well and favorably known throughout the electronics industry. Acoustic Research has developed a new speaker system, which has attracted wide interest and much favorable comment in music circles. High Fidelity magazine pioneered in its field and has grown in influence and scope in the world of high fidelity.

Permit me to close with one word of warning: Music will never sound the same, especially from a small radio or old record player, once a convincing demonstration of stereophonic sound is experienced firsthand. We are in truth living in a fabulous world and I am very proud that my district and State through the growing electronics industry are contributing so much toward this impressive progress.

Honored by Boy Scouts of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 4, 1959

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, at noon today I was highly honored with the presentation of a badge from the Boy Scouts of America for the celebration of the 49th anniversary of the Boy Scouts of America during Boy Scout Week, February 7 through 13. It is with genuine pride and honor that I shall wear this badge of the Boy Scouts of America which carries with it so much meaning and significance in the finest character-building organization for boys in the entire world.

The Boy Scouts of America have made monumental contributions in the building of sound, dependable character in the future young men of our country. In this fine work of molding honorable character, the Boy Scouts are responsible for tomorrow's national leadership. Among the Boy Scouts in the Halls of the Capitol today and who will be here during Boy Scout Week, surely may be a future President of the United States and certainly those who will hold great positions of responsibility in the direction and affairs of our country in the years to come.

I was presented with this honorable badge of the Boy Scouts of America by a Boy Scout who not only excellently represented the Boy Scouts of America but also made an excellent presentation. Although young in years, Paul Murphy, Jr., who presented me with this honorable badge, is one who might inspire all of America to courage and fineness. Possessing an attractive personality, being very courteous and thoughtful, Paul is also extremely able. A student of the Russian language, already he is able to speak some of this very difficult language. In addition, he has many other accomplishments, but above all he has the courage to overcome all difficulties and burdens with which he may be faced. This is indeed a real test of character.

Following is the quoted text of the presentation speech of Paul Murphy, Jr.:

I am Cub Scout Paul Murphy, Jr. During Boy Scout Week, February 7 through 13, the Boy Scouts of America celebrate their 49th anniversary. I have the honor to represent the Boy Scouts of America in making this presentation to you, Mrs. ROGERS. We would like you to join in the 49th celebration of Boy Scout Week by wearing this badge during Boy Scout Week.

At this point, Paul Murphy pinned the Boy Scout badge on my jacket lapel.

In conclusion, I extend my thanks and sincere and genuine appreciation to Paul Murphy, Jr., and through him to the Boy Scouts of America. I assure them I shall be honored to wear this badge during Boy Scout Week in America, February 7 through 13.

History Repeats Itself

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ISIDORE DOLLINGER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 4, 1959

Mr. DOLLINGER. Mr. Speaker, recently, a group of southern Senators proposed a constitutional amendment that would give States exclusive power to decide whether their school systems should be integrated. It specifies that nothing in the Constitution shall be construed to deny the States the right to determine for themselves the manner in which their public educational facilities shall be administered. The apparent purpose of this is to maintain segregated schools, to discriminate among students because of color. Such a plan is undemocratic and completely contrary to the recognized duty of our States and the Federal Government, to provide education for our youth on an equal basis, free from bias or discrimination.

The prevailing opinion is that the proposed amendment is given no chance of getting the two-thirds majorities needed for approval, but we must not lose sight of the fact that it is one more attempt to allow discrimination and undemocratic practices to flourish.

Let us recall another time of internal crisis in our history. In 1861 the following amendment relating to slavery was proposed:

Article 13: No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State.

This proposed amendment to the Constitution failed of ratification by the States.

The amendments discussed are analogous in that both would place certain fundamental human rights in jeopardy; each would curtail the powers of Congress to uphold and preserve the national ideal; each would make it possible for the States wishing to do so, to inflict indignities upon certain of their citizens—which would be abhorrent to the United States considered as a whole; both would reflect unfavorably upon the Nation in that their motives are undemocratic and a violation of rights guaranteed under our Constitution.

States rights are important, of course, but our Founding Fathers and our wise leaders who have followed in their footsteps have recognized the necessity of curbing a State or several States when undemocratic action by a few would undermine or belittle our Nation. Congress must have the authority to create and to uphold the law of the land in order to protect the rights of all our citizens, when problems of national import are at stake.

The will of the people prevailed in 1861 when they refused to accept an undemocratic amendment to the Constitution, as it will today, in this latest attempt to deny certain inalienable rights.

Address by Senator Lyndon B. Johnson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 4, 1959

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, Tuesday evening, February 3, I was privileged to attend a dinner of the Veterans of Foreign Wars at which the distinguished majority leader of the Senate, the Honorable LYNDON B. JOHNSON, was presented with an award in recognition of his public service.

I think that the Veterans of Foreign Wars, ever mindful of the security of our country, could not have made a more appropriate and more deserving choice for this signal honor than Senator JOHNSON, who is also chairman of the Preparedness Investigating Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Armed Services.

Senator JOHNSON's record in Congress is well known to all of us. He is a man of deep convictions, courage, and vision. He is without question the most outstanding personality in Congress today and has filled the void of leadership existing in Washington, which leadership our Nation so sorely needs in these trying days in order to withstand the onslaught of Communist aggression. Senator JOHNSON did not hesitate to sponsor civil rights legislation such as he introduced recently, despite the criticism he knew he would have to face in his home State.

Mr. Speaker, in accepting the award from the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Senator JOHNSON delivered a most timely address dealing with the problems of national security as we face them today—an address which I believe every citizen will want to read. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to insert this address in order to bring it to the attention of all our colleagues and to the American people. It is as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATE DEMOCRATIC LEADER LYNDON B. JOHNSON AT VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS DINNER, WASHINGTON, D.C., FEBRUARY 3, 1959

FOR THE COMMON DEFENSE

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, for this award—and for the honor of this occasion—I am most grateful to you. While your recognition is to my public service, this moment is one of deep personal meaning to me.

I accept this award in the sense of a representative of the million of Americans who have joined in a partnership to provide for the common defense.

This includes those who faced the enemy in combat.

This includes those who have produced the tools of preparedness.

THE THOUGHT OF PREPAREDNESS

This includes those who, like the Veterans of Foreign Wars, have banded together to keep alive the thought of preparedness in the hearts of our citizens.

The VFW is not just an organization founded upon memories of events which become nostalgic as we get farther from them. It is a vital force upon the American scene today.

For 22 years now—as a Member of the House and as a Member of the Senate—I have served in the Congress. Throughout that period I have served continuously on those committees charged with the most direct responsibility for our national security.

DECISION AND RESPONSIBILITY

National security—in these times—is complex. National strength is costly.

The burdens of decision and responsibility are trials.

But when these matters are approached in terms of individual human lives, the complexities become simple, the cost becomes cheap, and the trials cease to matter.

The question today has not changed since 1942.

Can free men ask their sons to defend freedom with less than the best of weapons or less than the maximum of willing support wherever the line of battle may fall?

For myself—and, I am sure, for you—I say that the answer is forthright and simple, "No."

NO AREA OF COMPROMISE

On this, there is no area of compromise. There is no alternative. There are choices. Either this is to be our standard and the purpose of our efforts, or it is not.

In terms of principle it is simple. It is not simple in terms of application. Twenty years ago—when we were beginning to mobilize for World War II—we used what weapons were needed to protect our freedom. Where we did not have those weapons on hand, we could afford to make substitutions. We handed our sons broom handles with signs attached to identify them as guns. We posted signs on old trucks and called them tanks. We simulated artillery with water pipes.

SUBSTITUTES FOR THE REAL THING

Those weapons that mattered so much to us in 1940 are basically obsolete, and even the broom handles are obsolete.

The demands of national security—and the change of our national position—no longer permit us the leisure of outfitting ourselves with substitutes for the real thing.

This is the first—and the greatest—single change in our concept of national security.

Time is no longer our friend. Time is no longer on our side.

Security is no longer a point at which we may hope to arrive 1 year, 2 years, or 10 years hence. Security—in the modern world—is a condition we must maintain each hour of each day.

This underscores another matter of great importance.

CHANGES IN MILITARY CONCEPTS

Twenty years ago—in our period of mobilization against the threat afforded by the Axis Powers—you will recall the profound changes we were forced to undergo in our military concepts. At the beginning of mobilization, armored divisions and mechanized divisions were unheard of. Paratroops and dive-bombing and landing craft were unknown concepts. The most romantic branch of our services was the horse cavalry.

VICTORIES—THE PRODUCT OF CHANGE

Our victories in World War II were the product of changes we were forced to make in our thinking after the war in Europe had begun.

Today—and for so long as the Nation shall endure—we do not have and will not have that same margin of time.

THE EDGE OF CAPABILITY

For more than a decade, peace has been maintained because—as men such as Winston Churchill have pointed out—we of the United States have held a continuing edge in capabilities. What we often overlook is that American science gave us the lead in the nuclear age. This lead—won by the invention and creativeness of our minds—served the world as the greatest single deterrent to aggression. The fact that we had unquestioned leadership in this realm made it unnecessary to use atomic energy in any military form.

THE TIME OF DANGER

This demonstrates the point that needs making now. Our greatest time of danger in the world is at times of transition.

When we come to a phase in which old concepts are obsolete and new concepts are not yet perfected, there is where the danger lies.

SECURITY FOR THE FUTURE

If American science had not been the leader in bringing free men to the atomic age, the cost of national security these past 15 years would have been prohibitive beyond our imagination. The parallel challenge of the opportunities of space is identical.

The weapons of the past are obsolete. The strategies of the past are obsolete. Along with this transition, we must fact another fact of change.

ONE GOAL FOR AMERICA

We are working now in the Senate on the job that is foremost for the Members of the legislative branch—getting the facts. We must have those facts to discharge our duties. It is my hope, though, that out of this can come the search for a new way and a better way to bring together—rather than to keep apart—our joint pursuits of the same goal.

There is—and must be—only one goal for Americans: To provide our Nation with security and, through that strength, to be leaders for peace.

A TIME OF GREAT POTENTIAL

We have come to a time of great potential. Never has there been so great an opportunity for us as that opening now. If we move with vigor into the leadership of space, we shall turn those wild fields into the meadows of peace. The opportunity to achieve a creative peace is the opportunity before us now, and the challenge to our lives, our talents, our will. With this before us, let us so work that it shall never be said again that we did too little, too late.

Purchase of Foreign-Made Turbine Generators by the REA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN H. DENT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 4, 1959

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I was not surprised, although I must confess I was, like the rest of my home town, puzzled at the action of the REA in the purchase of foreign-made turbine generators.

This in the face of a chronic unemployment of about 4 million American workers.

This, too, in the face of the cry for more aid from this country from practically every nation on the face of the earth.

I have said before, and I now repeat it is time to review our position in world trade and aid.

It is time we look after our own interest with a little more pride and zeal. I repeat again the wise admonition of President Theodore Roosevelt when he said:

There is room for only one soul loyalty and that loyalty is to the American people.

I submit for the RECORD the wire of protest from Mayor A. B. Elias of the city of Jeannette and my protest to the REA:

JEANNETTE, PA., February 3, 1959.
Congressman JOHN H. DENT,
House Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

We in Jeanette are very much puzzled by last Friday's action of the REA in Washington. Contract for two large turbine generators for the Medina Electric Cooperative in Hondo, Tex., was awarded to Brown Boveri of Switzerland after the user had indicated our local Elliott Co. as the supplier. Loss of this business will seriously affect employment at the local plant which is already low, and our relief rolls, as you know, are already high.

A. B. ELIAS,
Mayor, City of Jeannette.

FEBRUARY 4, 1959.

Mr. DAVID HILL,
Administrator, REA, Washington, D.C.:

Pursuant to my telephone conversation, I herewith officially and vigorously protest the awarding turbine generator contract the Medina Electric Corp. to Switzerland. The Elliott Co. in Jeannette, Pa., seriously affected by this decision. Entire community considered serious labor surplus area and every man-hour payroll denied means that much more in local taxes, local loss of business, and local relief rolls. This matter goes deeper than a mere acquiring of machinery and seriously affects the economic and moral fiber of our way of life. Governments by their taxing powers are rapidly destroying the competitive quality of American manufacturers and the unrestrictive right grants competition for country to bid on American requirements, especially in nontaxpaying corporations and Government purchasing sets an example that can be and is in some quarters, destructive and devastating to our economic well-being. I request a delay in the granting of this contract and that the work be given to American working men and American plants.

Sincerely,

JOHN H. DENT,
Member of Congress.

Lithuanian Independence Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 4, 1959

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a part of my remarks in observance of the Lithuanian Independence Day at the Lithuanian Citizens Club in Lawrence, Mass., on Sunday, February 8, 1959.

The matter follows:

On Lithuanian Independence Day it is pleasant to note that Lithuania is as old as most of the other European nations, with a language, with a culture, and with political institutions that are definitely her own. In fact she was an independent state 900 years ago.

In spite of centuries of struggle to defend herself against envious neighbors, the Lithuanians have succeeded in preserving their language, which is proof of their national spirit and their pride.

It is a strange fact of history that when the savage Tartar tribes swept out of the Orient they easily conquered Russia but were defeated in battle by the Lithuanian princes.

Some of that cruel Tartar character has survived and still manifests itself in the rule by terror that is practiced by the Communists of today.

Even the famous author of Polish descent, Joseph Conrad, has said that in the second half of the 18th century there were two centers of progressive ideas on the Continent of Europe: one was France; the other, Poland and Lithuania. The educated classes of Poland and Lithuania were permeated with the humanitarian ideas of French and English literature. There was a Diet and an elective monarchy; the universities of Vilnius and Warsaw were important centers of culture. The liberal complexion of Polish and Lithuanian institutions was naturally distasteful to Russia, Prussia, and Austria, who decided to eliminate the outposts of liberal and democratic ideas by partitioning the Polish-Lithuanian commonwealth among themselves.

Lithuania's subjection to Russia lasted 120 years.

In all that long time, however, the spirit of the people never weakened. They never lost hope of regaining their freedom and independence.

The oppressive rule of the czars prevented economic and cultural development. The only way out for many was by emigration to the New World. Happily for us, there are now over a million Lithuanians in the United States.

The people in Lithuania know that you will speak for them in the free world, so that the free world will not forget its obligations toward those who live under the hated domination of the Communists.

Meanwhile, consoled and strengthened by their Catholic faith, Lithuanians in the homeland endure the Soviet tyranny. From their history they know that they can outlast Stalin and Khrushchev and others who, being mortal, must die. But faith is eternal.

Soviet troops and puppet officials seem to have the country under their control.

But there is a resistance movement that is doing its work in preparation for the day of liberation. The main purposes of this movement are: (1) To obstruct the attainment of all Bolshevik political aims; (2) to keep the local inhabitants informed of the true state of affairs; and (3) to document everything that has been done by the Soviets in Lithuania since 1944 and is still being done. And it can only be left to the free world to hope that the hour is not far distant when the authors of these outrages against humanity will be brought to account and made to pay the just penalty for their crimes.

And what about the Russian people who were the first slaves of communism? They are quiet because they know that the secret police are everywhere watching and listening. But the Russian people must be thinking of the day when they, too, can reach for freedom.

The Soviets would like everybody to forget Lithuanian Independence Day.

This is impossible.

Every year as February 16 approaches the Soviets squirm.

They hear of the proclamations issued by State Governors and mayors of the cities, giving official recognition to Republic of Lithuania Day.

United States Senators and Representatives pay tribute to Lithuania's splendid record of progress during her years of freedom, and to the admirable personal qualities of her sons and daughters in the New World.

This is not a tribute that is voiced on 1 day of each year and forgotten until the next anniversary rolls around.

It involves our own character and our own responsibilities as a democratic people.

For the principle at stake concerns the sanctity of human rights and of elementary justice and decency.

On Lithuanian Independence Day we serve notice on the Soviet Union that we shall never relax in our efforts until Lithuania becomes once again a free and equal member of the family of nations.

School Money Without Strings

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS M. PELLY
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 4, 1959

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, during the past few years Federal grants-in-aid have developed rapidly until now, in a substantial degree, they help to support many major State government services. In Federal aid programs, the Congress has intended as much as possible to remove from such grants Federal direction, control, and interference, but it is obvious that through establishment of Federal standards it is not possible to eliminate Federal bureaucratic dictation and intervention.

What has happened is that to meet enormous and ever-increasing expenditures the Federal Government has tapped the most lucrative sources of tax revenue, leaving State and municipal governments little other than real property taxes and sales excises from which to meet their needs unless these State and municipal governments duplicate Federal taxation including individual and corporation income taxes, admission taxes, beverage taxes, as well as tobacco, gift, luxury, transportation, and communication taxes, to name a few.

The Federal Government developed the grants-in-aid type of appropriations to provide incentives to State and local governments to meet local needs. In all fairness, Mr. Speaker, it should be pointed out that the purposes of these aid programs are certainly for the most part meritorious. Of course, it is neither economical nor efficient to withdraw huge sums from the taxpayers of each State and then have a portion of such funds trickle piecemeal back to the States. However, the real argument against Federal grants is of course the Federal strings and the compulsory requirements imposed by law and regulation of Federal administering bureaus.

In my State of Washington, like in many other States, the State legislature is presently struggling with the problem of obtaining funds to meet adequately the responsibilities of State government under our constitution, including the needs of education. The government has requested $135 million in new taxes for public services as well as for a deficiency appropriation of $25.5 million to cover overspending in public welfare and to help lower the current State deficit estimated at about $80 million.

The Governor in his budget chopped off about $12 million from the current State school fund estimate recommended to the legislature by our State superintendent of public instruction. The State school directors association had recommended $40 million above the Governor's figure.

For educational construction funds our State is planning to issue $30 million in bonds, but all the while we are told the State is running out of borrowing power.

The harrowed Governor in a dilemma has expressed an opinion that Federal aid to education is the answer.

I have opposed Federal aid to education, Mr. Speaker, but nevertheless I deemed it my responsibility to confer with our Washington State superintendent of public instruction, Lloyd Andrews, who is widely recognized as courageous politically and at the same time dedicated to the cause of public education and conversant with its financial needs.

Thus, I sent Mr. Andrews a copy of the Murray-Metcalf bill because it seemed to represent the type of legislation which will get the nod from the congressional committees having jurisdiction over education.

As I expected, Mr. Andrews wrote me opposing the bill and, may I add, I strongly share his criticism in that as presently written this bill sets forth limitations and definitions of the States' education programs, and places authority for administration in the Office of the U.S. Commissioner of Education. For example, section 4, subsection (b), spells out specifically that this money shall be used for school construction and teachers' salaries.

I agree with Washington State's superintendent of public instruction in his position as stated to me that the general operation and maintenance of our public schools must be treated as a whole, and not in this manner, or to quote Mr. Andrews' own words, "We would have to abdicate our local and State jurisdiction over educational process."

In the Murray-Metcalf bill, furthermore, as Mr. Andrews pointed out, section 5 by inference sets forth priorities for school buildings, removing from the State the latitude of determining its own needs. Also in section 6, the U.S. Commissioner determines the purposes for teachers' salaries.

Mr. Speaker, I share my State superintendent's concern of such encroachment on State and local responsibility by control of the Central Government But I likewise have a deep interest in education and recognize adequate money must be provided to our local school authorities to enable them to provide classrooms and decently paid teachers for our expanding school population.

Therefore, I am introducing a no-strings-attached alternative bill to pay back some of their own money to the respective States and Hawaii for educational purposes free from any Federal controls. My bill would authorize an appropriation equal to 2 percent of all Federal income taxes collected in each State and Hawaii for education in the common or public schools. That is all. No standards or specifications of any sort are stipulated. The purposes for which these funds would be spent would be entirely up to each State and its legislature providing it was for education.

In other words, if some of our local school districts' financial affairs are critical, and I am convinced such is the case, let us give the local and State authorities help but refrain from dictating how they must solve their problems.

Under my bill, the handling of funds will not be in any way, shape, or form through the Federal Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. The only Federal responsibility will be the calculation of amounts to be returned to each State and then the transfer of funds by check from the Secretary of the Treasury. The amount would be automatically geared to the national income for each year. There would be no bureaucratic power or expense involved.

The accompanying table of the approximate Federal income tax collections by State or Territory for fiscal 1957 shows the estimated amount of income taxes. Also shown is 2 percent of each amount, which gives an idea of how much each State could expect to receive.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me urge consideration of a no-strings-attached type of bill instead of opening the door to a program that will only end with a Federal bureaucrat, so to speak, sitting on and dictating to, so to speak, every school board in America. Let us not take away the management of our schools from the parents and local communities and school boards.

Address by Hon. Herman E. Talmadge, of Georgia, Before the American Coalition of Patriotic Societies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERMAN E. TALMADGE
OF GEORGIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, February 4, 1959

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the text of an address which I delivered on Tuesday, February 3, 1959, at the 29th annual convention luncheon of the American Coalition of Patriotic Societies, held at the Mayflower Hotel, in Washington, D.C.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CONSTITUTION AND RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT

(Text of remarks of Hon. HERMAN E. TALMADGE, of Georgia, in addressing the 29th annual convention luncheon of the American Coalition of Patriotic Societies held in Washington, D.C.)

President Lory, distinguished guests and members of the American Coalition of Patriotic Societies, to have the privilege of sharing this significant occasion with you is a twofold pleasure for me.

Not only is it a great honor for which I am deeply and humbly grateful but, even more important, it affords me the desired opportunity to express to you and the societies you represent my profound gratitude for the assistance and support which you gave me, as a freshman Senator, in obtaining an unmistakable expression of public sentiment on the question of freedom of debate in the Senate.

The 364-page printed transcript of testimony, statements, and letters compiled by the special subcommittee of which I was chairman during the 85th Congress was the most comprehensive presentation of public sentiment on limitation of debate ever assembled. It was an impressive and convincing document which confirmed my long-held belief that the rank and file of the American public consider free debate in the Senate a vital safeguard of individual liberty in this country.

While I personally was opposed to any change in the Senate's rule governing cloture, I am pleased to report to you that the revisions made will not affect materially the right of any Senator to speak out in defense of the viewpoint of his State and people. Furthermore, I am convinced that the addition of a new provision recognizing for the first time in the rules of the Senate the body's constitutional continuity more than offsets the changes which were made.

Considered in balance, I believe those of us who adhere to the concept that the Senate is a continuing repository of State sovereignty on the national level won an impressive victory for constitutional government—a victory in which you of the American Coalition of Patriotic Societies can take particular pride for the invaluable role which you played in making it possible.

I want to thank each of you here today as representatives of your individual organizations for the magnificent way in which you acted to bolster our defense of constitutional fundamentals. And I especially want to express my gratitude to your alert and able executive secretary, Mrs. Leetch, for her indefatigable efforts in seeing that you and, through you, your organizations and citizens at the grassroots level throughout the Nation were fully informed about the ramifications of the issue. She is doing an outstanding job for you and the Nation.

It is most gratifying and encouraging to those of us in Congress who subscribe to the philosophy that responsible government is the product of strict adherence to the Constitution of the United States word for word as it is written to know that we are backed in our position by dedicated organizations with truly national memberships like the American Coalition. I wish this country had 100 more groups like yours to espouse the principles of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States and I am confident that if we had them the affairs of our Nation, both foreign and domestic, would not be in their present sad state.

The Declaration of Independence was written to give expression to the principles which our forefathers learned from bitter experience were essential to the maintenance of liberty and the Constitution was drafted and ratified to perpetuate those principles for posterity.

Under them the United States was founded as a nation in which government at all levels would be the least government necessary to do for the people what the people could not do for themselves.

Under them the United States was founded as a nation which respected the rights and integrity of other nations and demanded that it be accorded the same respect.

Under them the United States was founded as a nation dedicated to faith in God and the right of the individual to achieve his highest destiny under God consistent with the right of every other individual to do the same.

So long as the United States adhered to those founding principles, it grew, prospered, and was respected throughout the world.

But in recent years the United States has departed from those founding principles and, as a result, its economy is deteriorating, the rights of its people are being circumscribed and it is losing the respect of the other nations of the world.

In foreign affairs we have taken the position that we are always right and everyone else is always wrong. We have undertaken to try to make the world over in our own image and in so doing have sought to substitute words for wisdom, dollars for deeds, and bluster for good faith.

In domestic affairs we have countenanced the development of the philosophy that an all-powerful Central Government is better qualified to manage the affairs of the people than are the people themselves. In so doing we have sanctioned an ever-encroaching Federal bureaucracy which is steering the Nation on the road to bankruptcy and totalitarianism.

In personal affairs we have built unto ourselves false gods of creature comforts and have become so preoccupied with an all consuming quest for security that we have forgotten the words of the Psalmist that "blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord."

Is it any wonder then that our enemies depict us throughout the world as a nation of neurotic, meddling busybodies who attempt to buy what we are unable to earn and to preach what we ourselves are unwilling to practice?

Is it any wonder then that we are burdened with a taxload which borders on confiscation and a national debt which has mortgaged future generations and that government by laws enacted by the elected representatives of the people has given way to government by executive decree, judicial edict, and Federal bayonet?

Is it any wonder then that we have become a Nation plagued by stomach ulcers and heart attacks in which personal debt and national crime have reached all-time records and the Golden Rule is something which is used only to print on advertising rulers?

The sum total of the experience of mankind is that the inevitable result of the failure to profit by the mistakes of the past is to repeat them in the future.

Distressing as it is to admit, we in the United States seem bent upon proving that we have learned nothing from the past of either our own or any other nation.

What other conclusion can be drawn from the plain facts that the policies which we are following at home and abroad are diametrically opposed to the principles upon which our country was founded and are parallel to the courses which have brought about the downfall of every other major world power in history?

The apologists for our present course of personal and political expediency seek to promote their ends through the coercion of conformity and the intimidation of labels. Their reply to criticism is to call the critic a reactionary or worse and to plead in the name of their brand of pseudo-progress that changing times and changing conditions have made our founding fundamentals obsolete.

They would have the American people believe that the Constitution of the United States is an accordion which can be contracted or expanded to play any tune which might be popular at any time rather than the music by which the instrument is supposed to be played.

The lessons of the past give the lie to those constitutional improvisers.

They choose either to forget or deliberately to ignore that the collapse of Roman law under the weight of a decadent bureaucracy heralded the conquest of Rome by the barbarians.

They choose either to forget or deliberately to ignore that the attempt of the British Empire to extend its control over the world reduced Britain to national bankruptcy, state socialism, and military impotence.

They choose either to forget or deliberately to ignore that every nation in the history of the world which has sought to control the destiny of the world at the expense of its own citizens has fallen from within or without.

It could happen to the United States unless we change our course.

It will happen to Soviet Russia unless that country changes its course.

The advocates of our present course maintain there is no alternative.

I emphatically reject that philosophy of fatalism.

There is an alternative to a foreign policy based upon the inevitability of world conflict.

There is an alternative to a domestic policy based upon the regimentation of people and resources.

There is an alternative to a personal philosophy based upon physical existence as an end unto itself.

That alternative is simply expressed in the development of an America so strong militarily, economically, and spiritually that any nation choosing to attack us invites not retaliation but annihilation.

And it is an alternative which can be realized only in a return to the principles of individual freedom, free-enterprise economy, and government on all levels which is the servant, not the master, of the people.

The cause of our present national dilemma is what Thomas Jefferson characterized as "more machinery of government than is necessary."

With the exception of the external menace of communism, all of the ills and problems of the United States can be summarized in the one phrase—too much government.

The American economy is suffering from too much government.

We have 48-cent dollars and face the prospect of 10-cent dollars as the result of ever-broadening governmental policies and programs which are bankrupting our Nation and mortgaging our future.

American prestige abroad is suffering from too much government.

We find ourselves despised and distrusted throughout most of the world as the result of our continued interference in the affairs of other nations through our various bureaucratic and paternalistic programs of spending and instruction.

The American people themselves are suffering from too much government.

The mushrooming Federal establishment, like quicksand claiming its victim, is steadily embracing more and more affairs traditionally and constitutionally regarded as local matters and as a result the individual citizen finds himself with less and less voice in the conduct of his local government and its institutions.

I cannot bring myself to believe that the majority of American people approve of the current philosophy that central governments must be all things to all men and do all things for all men.

To the contrary, the mail which I receive from all sections of the Nation indicates to me that the average citizen is gravely concerned about the present course of our Nation and the consequences of pursuing it to its ultimate conclusion.

It is my belief that the American people want to see the Federal budget balanced and the Nation's economy stabilized.

It is my belief that the American people want the United States to cease doing for people in other countries what it either is unable or unwilling to do for our own citizens here at home.

It is my belief that the American people want the Federal Government to confine its activities to those areas reserved to it by the Constitution and leave the management of all other affairs to local people on the local level.

It is my belief that the American people want above all else for the United States to be made militarily and economically secure and for themselves to be left alone to run their own affairs and enjoy the fruits of their own labors.

Our present course offers only one of three ultimate conclusions: conquest from without, collapse from within or development here in the United States of a totalitarian government as reprehensible as that which exists in the Soviet Union.

It is incomprehensible to me that free men and women living in a free society will choose to wait supinely for either of the first two consequences or to countenance passively the implementation of the latter.

I choose rather to believe with Thomas Jefferson that—

"The people may be misled or deceived for a time, but where the avenues of truth are open there men will learn to reject what is false and harmful. Where the people are well informed, they can be trusted with their own government; whenever things get so far wrong as to attract public notice they may be relied upon to set them to rights."

Throughout the Nation there is a growing awakening to the dangers inherent in our country's present policies and a swelling voice for a recognition of the lessons of the past through a return to the fundamentals of constitutional, republican government.

I feel with all my being that the American people already would have expressed themselves in favor of such a return to fundamentals had they had a clear-cut choice at the polls.

They certainly did not have it last November and frankness compels the observation that the overwhelming sweep of the Democratic Party was less an endorsement of its program than it was a repudiation of the Republican Party for its failure to act decisively to solve the Nation's problems.

Perhaps the saddest aspect of our present situation is that at this critical juncture in our national life, we of the United States have no one in a position of top executive responsibility to whom we can look for dynamic and imaginative leadership to thwart the spread of inflation and regimentation at home and to deal with the threat of communism abroad.

But I have unlimited faith in the desire and willingness of the American people to demand that their national house be set in order and I believe that that desire and willingness is not far from making itself felt.

In a constitutional republic such as ours, the masses may not be immediately articulate, but once given leaders and leadership they are swift in making their wishes felt and known.

A fact which must never be discounted is that the essence of our concept of constitutional government is, from the words of the Declaration of Independence, that our National Government derives its "just powers from the consent of the governed."

It is true that policies and programs can be initiated and sometimes even carried out without the "consent of the governed" but ultimately, as always has been the case in our national life, the will of the people has overwhelmed the efforts of those who sought to frustrate or circumvent it.

The most serious constitutional problem to confront our Nation since the War Between the States is the direct result of the failure of those in responsible positions of leadership in all three branches of the Federal Government to take into account the fact that governmental programs and policies to be implemented successfully must square with the "consent of the governed."

I refer to the present effort to force a new social order upon an entire region of our Nation by judicial constitutional amendment.

It is my firm conviction that the historians of the future in looking back upon the present time will record as one of the gravest and most costly mistakes of our national life the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to usurp unto itself authority to make judicial questions out of matters of human relations which should be left to the orderly processes of evolution.

I say that, my friends, because, unless Congress acts soon and decisively to resolve that issue on a realistic, constitutional basis, the inevitable result will be the destruction of public education throughout the South. And, engaged as we are in a life-or-death struggle with the forces of world communism, the United States cannot under any circumstances afford to permit such a tragic consequence to rob it of the minds and talents of a great segment of its youth.

The answer is not to be found in the use of Federal bayonets, Federal control of education, or rearing a generation in ignorance.

My long and serious study of the question has convinced me that—feelings on the subject being as strong and as inflamed as they are on both sides—there is only one solution compatible with constitutional concepts to which all persons of all shades of opinion can subscribe.

That solution is to invoke our heritage of "consent of the governed" by amending the Constitution of the United States to give the people on the State and local level the right to determine for themselves the manner in which the issue will be solved in their localities.

It was with that in mind that I last week stood before the Senate and, with all the sincerity of my being, proposed a constitutional amendment which would read as follows:

"Administrative control of any public school, public educational institution, or public educational system operated by any State or by any political or other subdivision thereof, shall be vested exclusively in such State and subdivision and nothing contained in this Constitution shall be construed to deny to the residents thereof the right to determine for themselves the manner in which any such school, institution, or system is administered by such State and subdivision."

The adoption of such an amendment would settle the question for all times and rid the Nation of a divisive issue which threatens to tear it asunder.

That is true because such a provision in our Constitution would leave the citizens of each State and locality free to make their own decisions in accordance with local conditions and prevailing attitudes as to how and when their schools would comply with the Supreme Court's school decision.

That is true because such a provision in our Constitution would prevent destruction of the public schools of the South and would end for all time any threat from any quarter of Federal control of education.

That is true because such a provision in our Constitution would assure uninterrupted instruction for all the children of this country regardless of their color or place of residence.

That is true because such a provision in our Constitution would permit either retention of the status quo or orderly change as dictated by the requirements of public opinion and make certain that whatever change might take place would be by the constructive process of evolution rather than the destructive process of revolution.

That is true because such a provision in our Constitution would create a basis for unity throughout the Nation at a time when it is vitally important that we present a united front before our enemies.

The public schools of the United States are local institutions which have been established and are operated and financed by local people on the local level and all persons willing to view the question dispassionately will admit that to fulfill their role they must be administered on the local level in accordance with the wishes of the parents of the children attending them.

I do not believe there is any person who is genuinely concerned about the future of our Nation and the education of all its children who cannot and will not subscribe to the proposition of local control of schools.

And it is on that basis that I have appealed to all Americans—particularly to the parents of school-age children—to let their wishes on this subject be known to their Senators and Congressmen. It is an appeal which I reiterate here today and urge that you take it back with you to the citizens and organizations of your respective communities throughout the Nation.

I am convinced that if the public will express itself on this question the result will be to give the 86th Congress a mandate to afford the people of America an opportunity to amend the Constitution to assure for all time to come that control of the public schools shall forever remain in the hands of local people on the local level.

Our heritage as free Americans is that our Government's foundations rest upon the will of the people.

It is a heritage of which we are proud and which the entire world respects.

It is a heritage to which we must adhere if we are to succeed in passing it uncompromised to our children and their children after them.

It is a heritage which is to be put to an acid test in the issues now confronting our country.

Those of us who believe in responsible, constitutional government have our work cut out for us if we are to preserve that heritage.

With our faith in Almighty God and our feet firmly planted on the rock of the Constitution, I am supremely confident that we shall not fail.

I thank you.

SENATE

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1959

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, who art righteous in all Thy ways and holy in all Thy works, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and whose dominion endureth throughout all generations, and yet who art nigh unto all them that call upon Thee in truth.

All that is highest and deepest in our own lives finds its source in the living fountain of Thine own Being—

For every virtue we possess
And every victory won,
And every thought of holiness
Are Thine alone.

Speak to our hearts when courage fails and men faint for fear and the love of many grows cold and there is distress among the nations upon the earth.

Keep us resolute and steadfast in the things that cannot be shaken. Restore our faith in the omnipotence of good; and may we see, beyond the seen and temporal, the things unseen and eternal.

We ask it in the Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, February 4, 1959, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

As in executive session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H.R. 2256) to amend chapter 37 of title 38, United States Code, to provide additional funds for direct loans; to remove certain requirements with respect to the rate of interest on guaranteed loans; and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour for the introduction of bills and the transaction of other routine business. I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE PRESIDENT'S CIVIL RIGHTS MESSAGE

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, as a result of the courtesy of the President of the United States, I had an opportunity this morning to have delivered to me by his assistant, Mr. Harlow, the President's message on civil rights.

At this time I could not comment on the specific proposals. I believe it will be necessary to make a study of the bills that will follow. But there have been published in the newspapers some articles about this message and other messages, and the course of action the Congress may take. I believe the President's message is based upon the principle of conciliation and upon the stated objective of "building a better understanding."

Each of the President's proposals may not be a proper road to the objective. But that is something that can be determined by prudent men who are going to examine each bill in the light of reason.

A few weeks ago, Mr. President, I presented some suggestions on this subject, and they were incorporated in bills which were appropriately referred. At that time I said I hoped more would be forthcoming. Since then, we have had the suggestions of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and some colleagues associated with him. Now we have the administration's recommendations that come from the Department of Justice and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Perhaps other departments will be affected.

When we examine all these proposals together, the Congress may find that some are not practical but some that are very wise. It is our job to sort them out, to determine which course, in our judgment, will best serve the interest of unity in our country.

But, Mr. President, I believe the important thing is that there be an atmosphere of reason, an atmosphere in which all proposals can be considered and the issues decided upon their merits. I hope that will be the case. I believe it will be the case.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I am quite gratified by the not only temperate but reasoned statement made just now by the majority leader. I think he has put in proper focus the attitude of the President of the United States in this rather explosive field—and I believe we can say it is an explosive field, sometimes surcharged with a high degree of emotionalism.

But everyone knows that the President of the United States is a man of utmost good will who always has devoted himself to the moderate course. I think the dictionary says "moderation is the avoidance of both extremes"; and certainly that can be applied to the President of the United States. He makes the point that the rule of law must be supreme and that equality of the individual must be advanced.

So his whole hope, as it has been indicated in the conferences I have been privileged to attend, attests the fact that his is always the modest approach in the direction of great moral goals. And I am confident that in proportion as we do bring reason—sometimes referred to as "sweet reason"—to this rather challenging problem, we shall get the job done.

My distinguished friend has stated that Congress can be moderate, too; and that is absolutely true. As I look back over a long period of time, I believe that, somehow, with time, patience, forbearance, and the impact of the good, healing force that always has been manifest in both bodies of the Congress, we come to solid conclusions, and do so in a moderate and reasoned fashion.

So I am hopeful and, in fact, confident that out of this approach something constructive and fruitful will be achieved.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished minority leader. He has made the type of statement which I would expect to come from one who has followed so moderate, intelligent, and constructive a course throughout so many years of public service.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thank the Senator from Texas.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

SPECIAL PROFESSIONAL SERVICES NEEDED IN CARRYING OUT PUBLIC SCHOOL DESEGREGATION PROGRAMS

A letter from the Secretary, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to assist in meeting the costs of special professional services needed in carrying out public school desegregation programs, and for other purposes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

PLANS FOR WORKS OF IMPROVEMENT IN STATES OF TENNESSEE AND TEXAS

A letter from the Acting Director, Bureau of the Budget, Executive Office of the President, transmitting, pursuant to law, plans for works of improvement in the States of Tennessee and Texas (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Works.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Georgia; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"H.R. 99

"Resolution memorializing Congress to call a convention for the purpose of considering an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the administration by the several States of their respective school systems, and for other purposes

"Whereas recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have tended to withdraw from the sovereign States power to administer their respective school systems in a fashion never contemplated or intended for the ratifiers of the Constitution; and

"Whereas this unconscionable usurpation of power has caused much dissension, discord, and disagreement, not only among the several States in the Union, but among the races, and tends to destroy the very basis of the sovereignty of the several States; and

"Whereas the enforcement of the decisions of the Supreme Court has led to bloodshed and tends to endanger public education throughout the several States of the Union; and

"Whereas the statehood bill submitting Alaska to the Union provides that administrative control of the public schools shall be vested exclusively in such State; and

"Whereas the junior Senator of the State of Georgia, Hon. HERMAN E. TALMADGE, has proposed an amendment to the Federal Constitution to grant to the several States the same right to control its public school system as has been granted to Alaska, in which this body concurs unanimously; and

"Whereas it is desirable that such amendment not provide for a local option, as to political subdivisions less than the States: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the General Assembly of Georgia, That the Congress of the United States be petitioned and is hereby petitioned to call a convention for the purpose of proposing the following article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

"ARTICLE

" 'SECTION 1. Administrative control of any public school, public educational institution, or public educational system, operated by any State or by any political or other subdivision thereof, shall be vested exclusively in such State and subdivision, and nothing contained in this Constitution shall be construed to deny the residents thereof the right to determine for themselves the manner in which any school institution or system is administered by such State and subdivision.'; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be and it hereby is requested to provide the mode of ratification that said amendment shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution of the United States when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States; and be it further

"Resolved, That a duly attested copy of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Member of the Congress in the State of Georgia; and be it further

"Resolved, That a duly attested copy of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the Governor of every State of the Union, the president of the State senate of every State, and the speaker of the house of representatives of every State, for the express purpose of encouraging the several sovereign States to take similar action in their legislatures to encourage the adoption of the foregoing amendment to the United States Constitution."

A letter in the nature of a petition from the Manor Park Citizens' Association, Washington, D.C., favoring a reduction in the $77 billion Federal budget; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. CARROLL:

A joint resolution of the legislature of the State of Colorado; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

"HOUSE JOINT MEMORIAL 1

"Memorializing the Congress of the United States to take such remedial action as deemed necessary to preclude the closing of low-power booster stations necessary for television reception in certain areas of the State of Colorado

"Whereas there are many communities and farm areas within the State of Colorado whose people depend upon low-power booster stations as their only means of receiving television programs; and

"Whereas the rugged terrain of the Rocky Mountain region makes the use of ultra-high frequency translator stations impractical, if indeed not impossible, according to the opinions expressed by competent and qualified broadcast engineers, as well as by certain members of the Federal Communications Commission; and

"Whereas it is economically impossible for these communities and farm areas to support, construct, or operate any other form of duly authorized television services; and

"Whereas there is ample proof that low-power booster stations can be regulated so as to preclude interference with licensed television services or other services; and

"Whereas the Federal Communications Commission did summarily dismiss, without formal hearing, its own rulemaking proceedings relating to 'repeater' or 'booster' stations operating in the VHF television band of frequency assignments; and

"Whereas the Federal Communications Commission did on December 31, 1958, make formal announcement of its dismissal of petitions for reconsideration, including those filed by Gov. Stephen L. R. McNichols, of Colorado; the Honorable Edwin C. Johnson, former governor and U.S. Senator from Colorado; and the Honorable GORDON ALLOTT, U.S. Senator from Colorado—all of whom sought to procure reasonable rules which would permit the continued operation of said booster stations under the regulatory power of the Federal Government; and

"Whereas the Federal Communications Commission did also announce on December 31, 1958, that all booster stations would be given a period of 90 days in which to apply for conversion of ultra-high frequency translators or some other authorized television operation, and upon failure to do so would be ordered to cease operation: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the 42d General Assembly of the State of Colorado, the Senate concurring herein, That this general assembly hereby memorializes the Congress of the United States for such remedial action within such 90-day period as the Congress deems fit through the exercise of its authority over the Federal Communications Commission to insure the continued operation of low-power booster stations, to the end that the people in the nonmetropolitan areas of the State of Colorado shall not be denied their basic right to equality of access to the informational, educational, inspirational, cultural, and entertainment service of the American system of free television broadcasting; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to the Senators and Congressmen representing the State of Colorado in the Congress of the United States.

"CHARLES R. CONKLIN,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives.
"ROBERT S. EBERHARDT,
"Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.
"ROBERT T. KNOWS,
"President of the Senate.
"LUCILE L. SHUSTER,
"Secretary of the Senate."

By Mr. HRUSKA:

A resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska; to the Committee on Finance:

"LEGISLATIVE RESOLUTION 11

"Whereas since the enactment in 1919 of the first State gasoline tax, this levy has been historically and rightfully a State tax; and

"Whereas the gasoline tax has traditionally provided the major portion of the funds needed by the States to construct and maintain their highway system; and

"Whereas in 1932, the Federal Government also imposed an excise tax on gasoline, as a temporary, emergency, revenue-producing measure; and

"Whereas the expressed, and reaffirmed, intent of Congress to vacate this tax field has not been carried out; and

"Whereas instead, the original Federal excise on gasoline has been continued and increased by 200 percent; and

"Whereas the mounting Federal tax on this product threatens to preempt this legitimate tax source belonging by priority and equity to the States; and

"Whereas further increase in the Federal gasoline tax rate would lead to serious restriction upon the ability of the States to secure funds for needed highway improvements: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the members of the Nebraska Legislature in 69th session assembled, That the 69th session of the Nebraska Legislature, does respectfully record its opposition to any further increase in the present Federal excise tax on gasoline; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted by the clerk of the legislature to the Office of the President of the United States and to the Members of the House of Representatives and of the U.S. Senate from Nebraska, and to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives and to the chairman of the Finance Committee of the U.S. Senate.

"DWIGHT W. BURNEY,
"President of the Legislature.
"HUGO F. SRB,
"Clerk of the Legislature."

RESOLUTION OF LEAGUE OF NORTH DAKOTA MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the League of North Dakota Municipalities at Devils Lake, N. Dak., relating to construction grants to municipalities.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas Public Law 660 (sewage construction grant program) administered by the States through the U.S. Public Health Service has done much to promote and develop sewage treatment in North Dakota; and

Whereas due to limitations of $250,000 for any one grant, the larger communities are not receiving grants of 30 percent of the cost of the project, as specified in Public Law 660; and

Whereas funds presently allocated are insufficient to develop this program in most States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the League of North Dakota Municipalities in convention at Devils Lake urges the U.S. Congress to amend Public Law 660 to permit construction grants at a level of not less than $100 million a year and that the maximum grant to any one municipality be raised to $500,000; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of the League of North Dakota Municipalities be instructed to transmit copies of this resolution to each Senator and Congressman from North Dakota, to the chairmen of the House and Senate Committees on Public Works, and to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.

DEVILS LAKE, October 14, 1958.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR MAKING GRANTS UNDER FEDERAL AIRPORT ACT—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I report favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 1) to amend the Federal Airport Act in order to extend the time for making grants under the provisions of such act, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 49) thereon. I ask unanimous consent that the report be printed, together with minority views.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PROXMIRE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GOLDWATER:

S. 942. A bill to establish a Commission on Equal Job Opportunity Under Government Contracts; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

(See the remarks of Mr. GOLDWATER when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. ENGLE (for himself, Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. BIBLE, Mr. CANNON, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. KUCHEL, Mr. MCGEE, and Mr. MOSS):

S. 943. A bill to provide for a program of weather modification to be carried out by the Secretary of the Interior, acting in cooperation with the National Science Foundation, to increase substantially the annual average of usable supply of water available in the Colorado River drainage basin, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

(See the remarks of Mr. ENGLE when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

WELCOME TO INTER-AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. SMATHERS submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 9), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas the Inter-American Bar Association will hold its 11th conference at Miami, Fla., during the month of April 1959; and

Whereas the purposes of the association, as stated in its constitution, are to establish and maintain relations between associations and organizations of lawyers, national and local, in the various countries of the Americas, to provide a forum for exchange of views, and to encourage cordial relations among the lawyers of the Western Hemisphere; and

Whereas the high character of this international association, its deliberations and its members can do much to encourage cordial relations among the countries of the Western Hemisphere: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States welcomes the Inter-American Bar Association to the United States, and wishes the association unparalleled success in its 11th conference; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the secretary general of the Inter-American Bar Association.

COMMISSION ON EQUAL JOB OPPORTUNITY UNDER GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, today the President is sending to Congress his message on civil rights. A part of that program will entail hearings before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. As the ranking Republican member of that committee, I introduce and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, a bill to establish a Commission on Equal Job Opportunity Under Government Contracts.

To those who might think it strange that a States righter is introducing a bill of this type, let me point out this Commission would have to do only with Federal Government contracts, and would not impinge on the rights of the States.

I ask that the bill be printed and lie on the table until the close of business on Monday next so that my colleagues who care to may join me in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD, and lie on the table, as requested by the Senator from Arizona.

The bill (S. 942) to establish a Commission on Equal Job Opportunity Under Government Contracts, introduced by Mr. GOLDWATER, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby created a Commission to be known as the "Commission on Equal Job Opportunity Under Government Contracts," hereinafter referred to as the Commission.

SEC. 2. (a) The Commission shall consist of fifteen members appointed by and serving at the pleasure of the President. The Chairman and Vice Chairman shall be designated by the President.

(b) Members of the Commission who are officers or employees of the United States shall serve the Commission without additional compensation. Members of the Commission who are not officers or employees of the United States shall each receive $50 per diem when engaged in the actual performance of duties vested in the Commission, plus reimbursement for travel, subsistence, and other expenses incurred by them in the performance of such duties.

(c) Service of an individual as a member of the Commission shall not be considered to be service or employment bringing such individual within the provisions of sections 281, 283, 284, 434, or 1914 of title 18 of the United States Code, or section 190 of the Revised Statutes (5 U.S.C. 99).

SEC. 3. (a) The Commission shall make investigations, studies, and surveys, and shall conduct such hearings, as may be necessary or appropriate in the discharge of its duties under this Act.

(b) To implement the policy of the United States Government to eliminate discrimination because of race, creed, color or national origin in the employment of persons in the performance of contracts or subcontracts to provide the Government with goods or services, the Commission shall make recommendations to the President and to Government contracting agencies with respect to the preparation, revision, execution, and enforcement of contract provisions relating to such nondiscrimination in employment.

(c) The Government agencies contracting for goods or services to be furnished the Government shall perform such duties as may be requested of them by the President to cooperate with the Commission.

(d) The Commission shall also encourage, by the development and distribution of pertinent information and by other appropriate means, the furtherance of educational programs by employer, labor, civic, educational, religious, and other nongovernmental groups in order to eliminate discrimination in employment.

(e) The Commission is authorized to establish and maintain cooperative relationships with agencies of State and local governments, as well as with nongovernmental bodies, to assist in achieving the purposes of this Act.

SEC. 4. The Commission may employ such personnel as may be required for the effective performance of its duties.

SEC. 5. The Commission shall render to the President annual reports for transmission to the Congress.

SEC. 6. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

PROGRAM OF WEATHER MODIFICATION TO INCREASE ANNUAL AVERAGE OF USABLE SUPPLY OF WATER IN COLORADO RIVER BASIN

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators ALLOTT, ANDERSON, BIBLE, CANNON, CARROLL, CHAVEZ, KUCHEL, MCGEE, and Moss, all from the Colorado River Basin States, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide for a program of weather modification to be carried out by the Secretary of the Interior, acting in cooperation with the National Science Foundation, to increase substantially the annual average of usable supply of water available in the Colorado River drainage basin, and for other purposes.

The proposal calls for a 10-year, $10 million weather modification program to increase in substantial degree the average annual usable supply of water from rainfall and snowfall in the Colorado Basin, which consists of portions of Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, and California. The program would be carried out by the Department of the Interior and the National Science Foundation which was given wide authority to conduct weather modification experiments in legislation enacted last year. It would include engineering and meteorological studies as well as investigations of physical methods and devices including, but not limited to, cloud seeding to increase precipitation and techniques to control snowpack storage and runoff.

We have reached the point where we should make some practical application of the scientific knowledge so far attained on this subject, in order to test techniques, improve on them, extend our knowledge and, above all, obtain some real dollars-and-cents benefit for the people. The Colorado Basin is the ideal area in which to conduct the program, because the southwestern corner of the United States is the most arid part of our country. The Colorado River flows from our highest snow-covered mountain ranges, through vast dry desert lands, to the sea.

If this program is carried into effect, it will benefit directly a region of tremendous agricultural and industrial importance whose ultimate water requirements far exceed the existing total water supply in the basin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 943) to provide for a program of weather modification to be carried out by the Secretary of the Interior, acting in cooperation with the National Science Foundation, to increase substantially the annual average of usable supply of water available in the Colorado River drainage basin, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. ENGLE (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, I am happy to join my good friend, the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], in sponsoring this bill that will bring the best of scientific research into the ever-pressing problem presented by our dwindling water supply. The Senator has been one of the great national leaders in the timely fight to develop and to conserve our natural resources.

I am firmly convinced that weather control by scientific means is not far away. I have had discussions with the noted Dr. Walter Orr Roberts, head of the high altitude weather observatory near Leadville, Colo. He also believes the control of weather can be brought about if we really go into effective basic scientific research. Other noted scientists have testified before congressional committees that the Soviet Union is doing intensive scientific research in the weather control field.

A sound scientific approach, such as proposed by this bill, would make it certain that this Nation must not lag behind in this important field.

Control of weather by scientific methods is now more than a theory, and this measure would enable the foremost scientists of the Nation to help solve problems that have long beset many arid regions of our Nation.

In the Colorado River Basin many millions of dollars have been spent in litigation and at times tempers have been on edge as the States wrangle over the precious water of the Colorado River. Approval of this bill would make it possible to do away with that bickering forever, as I feel scientific methods could provide enough water for all.

This would enable us to formulate a broad program of development in the Colorado River Basin States that should end our water problem for all time. But lack of water is not a problem for the West alone. There is hardly a region in the United States that is not confronted with water problems that the great scientific minds could help solve.

In our part of the West water is the lifeblood of our economy. Upon our precious water depends our existence. The constant demand for more water, the rivalry to obtain rights and bring about diversion at times threatens to render our own State of Colorado in twain. It causes an intense feeling that I would like to see ended for all time, and I believe this bill offers the start of the approach to a solution.

But, also, I feel this proposed legislation would aid the entire Nation. It will spur development of many kinds. It will provide additional employment, it will make huge recreation areas possible and it will be a boon to the economy of the Nation.

In the West, much of the new water contemplated by the bill, would be stored behind the Glen Canyon Dam and other units of the Colorado River project. It would permit the generation of electricity at an earlier date and start producing revenue to complete other dams and installations. It will allow the West to obtain its growth potential years ahead of the predictions made in the past.

The small amount to be spent could be one of the wisest investments this Nation could make. It is forward-looking legislation and by using wisdom and foresight we will move steadily ahead. By substituting science and scientific research for litigation and wishful thinking, we can meet head-on a great and pressing problem that will prove a blessing to our Nation.

VOLUNTARY PENSION PLANS FOR SELF-EMPLOYED INDIVIDUALS

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to encourage the establishment of voluntary pension plans by self-employed individuals.

Being a tax bill, the House will, of course, have to act before the Senate; but the House did pass this measure in the second session of the last Congress, and it is my understanding and belief that it will do so again early in this session.

The measure which I introduce is identical to the one which passed the House last year, known as the Jenkins-Keogh bill, and to the bills H.R. 9 and H.R. 10 introduced in this session by Representatives KEOGH and SIMPSON.

Under existing law a company with an approved pension plan pays no income taxes on its contribution. These pension costs are an expense of doing business and are deductible. Neither does the employee pay any current income tax on this payment to the fund for his benefit. Hence retirement funds for employees are accumulated out of pretax dollars.

The situation with respect to the accumulation of retirement funds by the self-employed is entirely different. A self-employed person must pay his current tax on all income—his retirement funds must be accumulated out of after-tax dollars.

This is a discrimination which the bill would remedy by exempting from current income tax certan limited amounts paid as retirement deposits by a self-employed person for the benefit of himself.

The maximum amount exempt in any one year is fixed at $2,500 or 10 percent of net earnings, whichever is lesser. There is also a lifetime limit of 20 times the maximum annual deduction of $2,500.

The bill would apply to about 10 million self-employed people—3 million in agriculture, forestry, and fishing, 4 million small businessmen, and 3 million in the professions—doctors, lawyers, accountants, engineers, scientists, and so forth.

Certainly these people should not be penalized in their preparation for retirement because they work for themselves rather than for some corporation. On the contrary, they should be treated equally in this regard as an incentive to continue their individualistic work.

I must concede that even with the passage of this bill there would be some inequalities, for there are many employees not covered by employer pension plans who would continue in the same position as self-employed people are now in.

The problem of the pensionless employee must also be solved. If it continues to prove impossible for these employees to establish pension plans through collective bargaining, legislation of the kind introduced here for self-employed must be worked out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 944) to encourage the establishment of voluntary pension plans by self-employed individuals, introduced by Mr. KEFAUVER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

LIBERALIZATION OF TARIFF LAWS FOR WORKS OF ART AND OTHER EXHIBITION MATERIAL

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 liberalizing the definition of "works of art" which may be imported duty-free so as to include modern art forms; it would also ease restrictions on the importation of articles of educational or artistic value when they are meant for exhibition purposes and not for sale.

The proposed legislation has the support of the Museum of Modern Art, the Metropolitan Museum, the Museum of Primitive Art, all located in New York City, and other museums, institutes, and colleges.

For the world's most modern society the United States retains some of the most antiquated tariff regulations which tend sharply to reduce the number of abstracts, collages, lithographs, and primitive carvings imported for the enjoyment of the public. The existing laws impede the cultural development of our Nation and tend to expose us to ridicule in other advanced countries.

For example, in 1912, Pablo Picasso Georges Braque developed the collage, now a recognized fine arts medium which is frequently composed of unusual materials including paper, cloth, and even manufactured objects such as nails. However, today, 47 years later, the Customs Bureau, guided by the Tariff Act, still rules that because a collage is not made from traditional materials it does not qualify as an original work of art and thus must be subject to duty at 20 percent of its declared value.

To highlight the absurdity of this situation, an original Picasso or Matisse painting could be imported duty free but a collage by the same world famous artist on precisely the same subject valued by art experts as high as $20,000, as some are, is subject to a customs levy of $4,000.

Other outmoded restrictions limit the importation of nondutiable sculpture to imitation of natural objects, chiefly the human form in their true proportion of length, breadth, and thickness. The strict interpretation of this definition automatically bans the levy-free importation of many abstract sculptures considered classics.

If we do not take steps to grant official art standing to such sculptures, along with collages, lithographs and even primitive carvings, then we are living in a cultural desert even though some of the most creative and productive talents in the art world were born, raised and trained in the United States.

The amendments the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and I are proposing would greatly increase the number and kind of original art objects imported into this country by U.S. art museums and dealers as well as art patrons who donate sizable collections to art institutions; in addition, they would encourage a much freer interchange of works of art between the United States and other countries. The loss of tariff revenues to the United States due to a more liberal interpretation of the tariff laws, deemed insignificant by authorities, would be more than compensated for by the increased cultural opportunities accruing to the United States.

The key amendment proposed would enlarge the definition in paragraph 1807 of the Tariff Act of 1930 to admit duty free original works of art done in oil, pen and ink, watercolors, and other traditional media and also that "in any other media, including applied paper and other materials, manufactured or otherwise, such as are used on collages," and original sculpture and statuary "constructed from any material or made in any form," not limited to conventional materials and representative forms.

Other amendments would remove import restrictions on certain printing processes such as lithographs under 20 years old, handwoven tapestries by modern artists, art objects from primitive societies made 50 years prior to the date of their entry, and "models of inventions and other improvements in the arts" used by architectural groups and others. Free entry would be granted for the sculptor's model and 10 replicas much in demand by museums and collectors.

Finally, payment of customs duties and the posting of bonds normally required could be waived on condition that the works of art were being imported not for sale but for exhibition purposes in the United States. These objects could also be transferred temporarily to a "commercial gallery or other premises for educational, scientific, agricultural, or cultural purposes or for the benefit of charitable organizations, and not for sale."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 948) to liberalize the tariff laws for works of art and other exhibition material, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Mr. DOUGLAS), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT OF IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY ACT

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952. This bill is by no means an attempt to revise the law in its entirety. In drafting it, I have merely sought to correct some of the more glaring inequities in the present law. I hope a majority of the Senate can agree with these revisions. This bill is similar to other short immigration bills I have sponsored in prior Congresses, with certain revisions reflecting amendments as contained in Public Law 85–316, which mainly covered hardship cases.

I want to make it clear, Mr. President, that although I am offering this modest proposal it should not be assumed that other changes in the act are not needed. My position on the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 is well known. At the heart of that act lies the national origins quota system, which is designed to exclude certain races and nationalities. There can be no justification for legislation which is based upon the false theory of the inferiority of certain nationalities or races.

The national origins quota system should be abolished. There should be a unified quota system which would allocate visas without regard to national origin, race, creed, or color.

Such a move would place our immigration policy more in line with that as expressed by George Washington in 1783:

> The bosom of America is open to receive not only the opulent and respectable stranger, but the oppressed and persecuted of all nations and religions; whom we shall welcome to a participation of all our rights and privileges, if by decency and propriety of conduct they appear to merit the enjoyment.

While a sweeping revision of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 is in order, in view of the obvious difficuties which are faced in obtaining such a revision, it is more advisable in my judgment that we make a concerted effort to at least eliminate some of the most blatant defects in the present act. That is what I am attempting to accomplish in the bill I am introducing today.

I should like now to make a brief summary of this bill's provisions:

First. Section 1 restores to professors eligibility for nonquota status—which they enjoyed prior to the McCarran Act—if a university requests their services. This proposed change is based on a feeling of confidence that our universities will select only well-qualified persons for employment on their teaching staffs. It, therefore, abolishes the unnecessary red-tape and delay involved in requiring universities to obtain clearance orders from the local employment service and then proving to the Immigration Service that the professor whose immigration is being sponsored is needed urgently in the United States. My amendment in no way changes the security requirements of our laws, as they concern all who wish to enter the United States.

Second. For more than 7 years I have been the sponsor of legislative proposals to ameliorate the harsh effects of the national-origins principle through quota pooling. I was, therefore, very greatly pleased when the President, in 1957, endorsed quota pooling in his special message on immigration. Quota pooling means simply that quota numbers made available to any given country, but not used by it, may be allocated to a country which needs them.

My own quota pooling proposal differed in some detail from that proposed by the administration. However, it is my feeling no useful purpose would be served by continuing to present two versions of the same idea to the Congress. For the sake of simplicity and to avoid confusion, I am, therefore, happy to incorporate the administration's quota pooling provision into my own bill as section 2.

Another of my proposals, adopted by the administration, is to repeal the provisions of present law under which some quotas are mortgaged for decades, in some cases even for centuries. This, too, is accomplished by section 2.

Third. Section 3 ends another of the racially discriminatory features of the present law. It abolished the racial ancestry blood test for persons "attributable by as much as one-half of their ancestry to a people or peoples indigenous to the Asia-Pacific triangle." Henceforth, all visa applicants would be classified only according to their place of birth.

Fourth. It has often been said that a man who tries to import a sack of beans into the United States and finds that it has been excluded, has the right of appeal, but a man who wants to bring his mother over and finds that she has been denied a visa, has no such right. Section 4 of my bill is designed to change that situation. It is designed to modify the anomaly of the present Immigration Act under which authority for the acts of the Immigration Service—which acts in many instances through the Board of Immigration Appeals—is concentrated in the hands of the Attorney General, while authority for the acts of the Consular Service is diffused among the numerous consuls, each of whom is the final arbiter in the visa application cases before him. Section 4 concentrates responsibility in a visa review board appointed by the Secretary of State, to which the sponsors of prospective immigrants may be allowed to appeal. This board would assure that visa regulations are enforced uniformly throughout the world and would also safeguard against irresponsible and capricious acts by individual consular officers.

Fifth. Section 5 deals with problems such as faced this country as a result of the courageous uprising of the Hungarian people against their Communist oppressors. It confirms the authority of the President to parole escapees into this country. It authorizes such action not only with regard to escapees from communism but also for persons escaping from racial, religious, or political oppression in countries within the general area of the Middle East.

Sixth. The concept of justice tempered with mercy is a part of our administration of law. It is deeply embedded in our religious traditions. It was in conformity with that concept that Congress long ago gave the Attorney General discretionary authority to suspend deportation in deserving cases. That authority was severely curtailed by the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, the Senate majority report on which states harshly and cruelly:

> Hardship or even unusual hardship to the alien or to his spouse, parent, or child is not sufficient to justify suspension of deportation.

Under section 6 of my bill the standards for suspension of deportation contained in the law in effect prior to the adoption of the McCarran Act are restored. As suspension of deportation will only be granted in the discretion of the Attorney General and only with the concurrence of Congress, I am certain that there is no danger of this humanitarian provision being abused.

Seventh. Sections 7 and 8 are purely procedural.

Mr. President, few will deny that immigration legislation is one of the most urgent items facing the Congress for action. Ever since I have been in the Senate, I have sponsored measures to alleviate the harshness of our immigration statutes.

The bill I introduce today is an attempt to provide a working basis for prompt action by the Judiciary Committee. It does not constitute a major revision; it does not go as far as many people, including myself, would desire. It does, however, deal with matters which simply should not be allowed to lag further. I hope that before this session is concluded, we shall at least have written into law the reforms which I have discussed in the Senate today.

I am pleased to announce that a companion bill is being offered in the House of Representatives by Representative THADDEUS MACHROWICZ.

I ask unanimous consent that this bill lie over on the desk through next week to permit the addition of names of cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk through next week for additional cosponsors.

The bill (S. 952) to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY, was received, read twice by title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INCLUSION OF CERTAIN PROPERTY DAMAGE WITHIN FLOOD CONTROL ACTIVITIES OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of February 2, 1959, the names of Mr. CLARK, Mr. PROXMIRE, and Mr. SCOTT were added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 859) declaring the inundation of property because of, or aggravated by, wind, waves, or tidal effects on the Great Lakes to be properly within the flood-control activities of the Federal Government, introduced by Mr. YOUNG of Ohio, on February 2, 1959.

REARRANGEMENT OF MINORITY MEMBERS OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON ATOMIC ENERGY

On motion of Mr. DIRKSEN, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the names of the minority members on the part of the Senate of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy be rearranged so that they will appear on the Joint Committee list in the following order, namely: BOURKE B. HICKENLOOPER, HENRY C. DWORSHAK, GEORGE D. AIKEN, and WALLACE F. BENNETT.

HAWAIIAN STATEHOOD—NOTICE OF HEARINGS

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, by direction of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs I wish to announce that the Subcommittee on Territories will open hearings on Hawaiian statehood at 10 a.m., Wednesday, February 25, the hearings to continue all day and the ensuing day. By direction of the committee and by unanimous vote the testimony will be limited to new testimony not given heretofore.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, notified the Senate that pursuant to the provisions of Public Law 301 of the 78th Congress, the Speaker had appointed Mr. ZELENKO, of New York, Mr. DOWNING, of Virginia, and Mr. RAY, of New York as members of the Board of Visitors to the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy, on the part of the House.

THE FOUR HORSEMEN RIDE AGAIN

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, today we are witness to the spectacle of the massive irresponsibility of those who believe that spending the funds we do not have will bring an unprecedented prosperity. This fiscal madness is engendered by the belief that if one goes in debt deep enough, he will be prosperous.

To the wild-riding spenders, spurring on their horses of inflation and debt, it does not matter that the value of the dollar tumbles still further and that those who can least afford it are hurt. Nothing matters but that the Federal Government is the "sugar daddy" who will take care of each and every man, woman, and child in the country, provided they know who their so-called benefactors are.

There was a time when the slogan "as sound as a dollar" meant something. There was a time, for instance, when, if one went to Canada, our neighbor Nation, he got $1.10 for every American dollar he spent there.

Well, Canada threw out their so-called "liberals." Today, if one buys anything in that country with an American dollar, he has to give $1.03-plus to buy a dollar's worth there. Today, we read of the uneasiness of some of our best financiers and investment specialists over the further devaluation of the dollar in the world markets.

I do not need to remind you, Mr. President, that under the big Government spending during the New Deal and Fair Deal administrations, the 100 cent purchasing power of the dollar in 1939 went down to 52 cents by 1953.

What did this mean to the so-called common man for whom these liberals' hearts bleed? It meant that the cost of food for families was almost twice what it had been. It meant that a young couple starting in housekeeping had to pay almost twice as much for their furniture. It meant that working clothes, clothes for children, and other necessary items cost almost twice as much. It meant that those who were living on fixed incomes—the retired, the elderly, the handicapped—had only half as much in dollar value with which to pay for their necessities.

Despite the efforts of the same massive irresponsibles, this Republican administration kept that galloping inflation down to only 4 cents in the last 6 years.

But the wild-riding spenders are riding high again. They ignore the fact that the President has submitted to Congress a budget of $77 billion—a high enough budget as it is—and delicately balanced to serve the needs of defense and all other Government expenditures.

They ignore the fact that all taxpayers are really under forced labor to the Federal Government alone for 3 or 4 months out of the year in order to pay not only for Government obligations, but also for the appalling sum of around $8 billion in interest alone on the Federal debt, a sum almost twice as much as all Federal expenditures in the early 1930's. Certainly, I know this is not the thirties, but there is no excuse for such fiscal madness as we are facing today.

We cannot, we dare not, ignore the danger signals. In the 6 years in which a Republican administration has been in office, we kept the budget in balance twice. The recession forced a deficit. We then raised the debt limit twice. Now we have the opportunity to balance the budget.

But, no; off we go to the wild blue yonder again. The President offered a housing bill tailored to our means. And what happens? Those who think we can spend our way out of debt have come in with a bill which immediately brings us further into debt. Then they have an airport bill which they say we must have. I am a pilot. No one is more conscious of the needs of air transportation than I am. But I can see no rhyme or reason in furnishing airports with plush terminal buildings any more than I can see furnishing every town with a railroad station.

Two nights ago a dreadful airplane accident occurred, and from early reports a part, if not a large part, of the blame is laid to the absence of a vital part of the instrument landing system, the glide path. It had not been installed yet. There are many not installed yet because there have not been funds. But the spenders want plush buildings, not safety.

I, along with other Republicans and some Democrats, can see only one way to stop inflation and to keep the dollar sound, and that is for the Federal Government to live within its means the same as we expect our families to live within their means.

We cannot stop Government waste, we cannot stop hair-brained ideas to be Santa Claus to everybody and everything, unless we have a balanced budget.

In our own lives, we buy what is important, but if there is not enough money for everything, we postpone what is not important at the moment. The Federal Government must do the same thing if it is to prevent Americans from hauling a wheelbarrow full of dollars to the grocery store to buy a loaf of bread.

We can and should get a dollar's value for every dollar spent in defense.

Give aid to our friends for strengthening the free world, and forget about being the Daddy Warbucks to every little or big nation that threatens to turn to our enemies unless we keep pouring out our hard-earned dollars to them. This is a nation of workers. Every dollar is earned by some man or woman in this country. It is not the rich who pay all these bills. If we confiscated every fortune in this country we could not keep this Government running more than a few weeks. No; it is the wage and salary earner who pays the bills.

So I say it is time to call a halt.

Such massive irresponsibility will lead to only one thing—a further devaluation of the dollar, higher and higher taxes, and a debt limit that will go higher than the highest satellite.

Let those who will, follow these galloping and wild riding spenders. Let them become infected with this fiscal madness. But if there are enough of us left who can see the dead end of such programs, let us speak.

Let us now tell the American people that it is their load to bear.

Let the American people know that those noble steeds of debt and inflation on which these modern day Lochinvars ride so lightheartedly will only lead them—not to a castle of dreams—but to the dungeon of overwhelming debt which will leech their earnings, their savings, and their future away in a morass of failure.

The four horsemen of bankruptcy ride again—deficit, debt, inflation, and waste—spurred on by the disciples of massive irresponsibility, and if their mad gallop is not stopped, their devastation of our money and our future and the future of world peace will be complete.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at this point in my remarks an article by Raymond Moley, entitled "Dollar War at Home," appearing in this week's Newsweek.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DOLLAR WAR AT HOME

(By Raymond Moley)

Inflation, like vice, is "a monster of so frightful mien, as to be hated needs only to be seen." But "seen too oft, familiar with her face," many of us first endure and then embrace it. For under our present-day complex economic system, there does not appear the old naked conflict between debtors and creditors which characterized so many political conflicts in our history. The combatants now are a multitude of interests, and countless numbers of us have divided concerns.

A precise listing of those whose interests are imperiled by inflation has been made by Dr. Marcus Nadler, an able consulting economist. They are holders of life insurance policies; depositors in commercial and savings banks; owners of E, F, and G savings bonds; members of credit unions; postal savers; Federal civilian retirees, and State and local employees; the noninsured under private retirement plans; railroad retirees. In the Nadler summation there are 269 million individuals with these anti-inflationary interests, and their stake is many, many billions of dollars.

However, it must be noted that there are many duplications in this summary, since people may have several of these interests. There are also many who appear in a listing of those whose interests favor inflation.

THE PROINFLATIONISTS

Dr. Julius Hirsch, an American economic consultant who was Economic Secretary in the Weimar Republic during the great German inflation in the 1920's, has supplied me with a carefully considered classification of those in our society who have, whether they know it or not, interests on the side of inflation.

These are farm owners, and also those who are self-employed, hired hands, and others directly dependent upon agriculture; owners of real estate, notably mortgaged property; owners of other real goods and facilities (not dollars or dollar claims), especially owners of mining, manufacturing, transportation, and most service enterprises; most debtors whose interest in a shrinking dollar becomes greater according to the length of term embodied in the debt; personal debtors, including installment debtors; and members of labor unions with some assurance of escalating devices.

To these I would add the part of our vast Federal civilian bureaucracy which will profit by personal promotion and other opportunities in more and more government spending. Seventeen percent of all employed Americans work for government.

The sum total of the individuals involved in these interests rivals that of Dr. Nadler's total who should oppose inflation. And the dollars involved number considerably more.

But there is also vast duplication in these figures. For millions have divided interests. In great numbers pensioners, savers, and holders of life insurance policies own real estate or owe money in many forms. The manufacturer faces conflicting concerns between his inventory and his future needs to buy raw material. He also has the problem of competition and sales resistance to higher prices.

AFTER THE JOY RIDE

Dr. Hirsch also lists a large class which favors inflation for some nonmaterial concern—sympathy, habit, real or fancied desire to help others. He cites a mother living on a pension or insurance who has a son who is deep in debt.

I would add those millions who vote by habit for the party of their tradition although its candidates may favor inflationary spending. Also, those who believe in a candidate who says categorically that he is for the little people, the weak or needy or oppressed. Or who vote for the glib, personable politician who chooses to see nothing beyond the next election. Then there are the empty headed who relish the joy ride of inflation. And, finally, the speculators who believe themselves smart enough to ride the tide. Many are like the man falling from the top of the building who shouts to the friend halfway down: "This is great, while it lasts."

It will be quite useless for the President and his advisers to appeal only in behalf of the people on fixed incomes and others whose dollars will buy less and less. He must get over to everyone the dire end when hysteria supplants reason.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AND THE BUDGET

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, in this morning's Washington Post and Times Herald there was a column by the very able columnist Walter Lippmann, entitled "McElroy's Troubles."

I have great respect for Mr. Lippmann, and agree with the basic tenet of his column; namely, that we cannot afford to run the risk of possible unilateral disarmament in order to balance the Federal budget. But I cannot agree with his statement that the argument between the administration and myself is "whether the balance of power should be calculated in terms of intercontinental missiles or whether it shall be judged in terms of the whole complex of armaments and of the international political situation."

I do not believe that our intercontinental missile capability alone is the issue.

The basic differences between this administration and myself on this matter of national defense are two:

The United States is allowing its overall retaliatory capacity to deteriorate in the face of the known growing Communist strength.

This administration is not being candid in its presentation of this deterioration to the people.

As a most recent instance, at the time Secretary McElroy agreed that his previous statement to the effect we would have a squadron of intercontinental ballistic missiles by next July 1 was wrong, he corrected himself with the assertion that this country would have such a squadron by January 1960.

This latest correction is also incorrect.

Nothing like a complete squadron of ICBM's is scheduled for January 1960.

I have no desire to prolong this argument, but believe that any statements issued by the administration should be accurate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Lippmann's column be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MCELROY'S TROUBLES

(By Walter Lippmann)

In the swirling controversy over the Eisenhower-McElroy budget the inquiring bystander must, I believe, accept the fact that the basic issue is not one which can be settled definitively. There is a race of armaments. But who is ahead now, and who will be ahead 2 years from now is not something that can be measured quantitatively, even if there existed perfect intelligence with exact and complete knowledge of the quantity and quality of all the weapons on both sides. What statesmen really have to estimate is what is likely to be the judgment of other statesmen about the existing balance of power. In making these judgments they have to listen to the calculations of the experts in various specialities. But they must be able to make the necessary discount in these expert calculations, remembering that they are essentially about war games and not about the whole reality.

For these calculations are invariably theoretical abstractions—what, for example, would happen if there were a war in which one side had X number of missiles and the other had X plus Y missiles?

At bottom the argument between the administration and Senator SYMINGTON is whether the balance of power should be calculated in terms of intercontinental missiles or whether it shall be judged in terms of the whole complex of armaments and of the international political situation.

My point in all this is not to say that Mr. McElroy and the administration are right. I think they are very wrong. But I do not think they are deliberately misleading the country. What they have done is to argue their case so badly that they are losing the confidence of the public.

The fatal error lies in the decision of the President to make the paramount issue of the present time a Federal budget balanced at the existing level of taxes, along with a promise of a reduction of taxes before the next presidential election. We are approaching one of the great climaxes of the cold war and the President's decision about the paramountcy of the budget reflects a failure to understand the nature of the cold war.

It makes suspect all the military estimates in the budget. For it is no part of the law of the land, or of that moral law which the President frequently invokes, that the existing tax structure cannot be raised and should be lowered. To insist on such a dogma about taxes is to tell the people and the world that national defense is not the first but only the secondary consideration in this Government.

From this it follows inevitably that Secretary McElroy's assurances about our overall strength are quite unconvincing. For nobody is prepared to believe that by a wonderfully lucky coincidence the money needed for national defense is just the amount of money we can afford to spend if the budget is to be balanced without raising taxes.

This initial error about the budget has forced Mr. McElroy into making the disastrous announcement that the United States has withdrawn from the missiles race. He may well be right that with fewer missiles there will still be an overall balance of power. But it is not good for the Russians and it is bad for our allies to be allowed to think that the richest Nation on earth is unwilling to pay what it costs to stay in that part of the race of armaments which has the most horrible prospects. Secretary McElroy's announcement is a most lamentable way to prepare for the impending negotiations which Secretary Dulles is now dealing with in Europe.

What should be done about it? It should be said in no uncertain terms that defense has the first priority. If the President will not say it, perhaps Congress itself should say it by resolution. There should then be a substantial increase in the military appropriations, an increase sufficient to put us back into the missiles race. Then an increase of taxes should be voted in order to balance this larger budget.

I am aware that the extra money invested in making more of the existing missiles may be "wasted"—wasted in the sense that these missiles will soon be obsolete and good only for the junk pile. But the race of armaments is in the same sense inherently wasteful since the objective is to make weapons which will never be used and will soon be obsolete.

Nevertheless we are in a race of armaments. It would be a great day for mankind if it could be ended. But if the race is to be ended, this will be done only if and when we are able to reach general political settlements with the Communist powers. The race of armaments cannot be ended or suspended merely because we wish to balance the budget without raising taxes or because it would be good politics to reduce taxes before the next election.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, one of the most revealing recent stories about what has actually been going on with respect to our national defense appeared last Sunday in the Washington Star, written by Miss Mary McGrory, entitled "Space Chief Out of Step But Voices No Sorrow."

An especially interesting quotation in this article is the following one from Director Roy W. Johnson, of the Advance Research Project Agency:

I can recall testifying before the Space Committee a year ago without being sworn in. I suspect it is to the good to take an oath, because under oath you search your own conscience as to what your most honest feelings are against the policy of your boss.

Mr. President, I congratulate Mr. Johnson for his candor and his courage. Surely, as the Congress once again considers the adequacy of our defenses, no more revealing statement could be made.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by Miss McGrory be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Sunday Star, Feb. 1, 1959]

SPACE CHIEF OUT OF STEP BUT VOICES NO SORROW

(By Mary McGrory)

The Pentagon official who left the ranks around the President's defense budget and confessed a need for more money to a Senate committee has no regrets, although he suspects he now stands very much alone.

Nonconformist Roy W. Johnson, Chief of the Advanced Research Projects Agency, said yesterday he intends to push his plea for $150 million more for the total space effort in the current fiscal year, despite a determined administration drive to keep all spending down.

Chairman LYNDON JOHNSON of the Senate Preparedness and Space Committees, which for 2 days heard other Pentagon leaders accept the budgets assigned them by the White House, praised Mr. Johnson for his honesty. He dryly termed most of the high-brass witnesses good soldiers.

IMPRESSED BY SENATOR

Actually, it was Senator JOHNSON who had a great deal to do with getting him to speak out, Mr. Johnson said in a telephone interview from his home in Stamford, Conn.:

"I got genuinely the feeling from Senator JOHNSON," said the Space Director, "that he is concerned."

The persuasive Texan had repeatedly pressed Mr. Johnson and his associates to speak frankly about our efforts in the space age, to say if we could do more and should do more.

At the end of a long afternoon, Mr. Johnson, a cheery, square-jawed, wavy-haired former General Electric Co. official, took a deep breath and admitted he was honestly concerned about our total space program and its adequacy at this point in time.

TESTIFIED UNDER OATH

How did it happen that Mr. Johnson, a lifelong Republican and a sincere believer in the Eisenhower efforts to balance the budget, flew in the face of Pentagon policy?

Partly it was because he was under oath.

"I can recall testifying before the Space Committee a year ago without being sworn in. I suspect it is to the good to take an oath, because under oath you search your conscience as to what your most honest feelings are against the policy of your boss."

Mr. Johnson said frankly he had no intention, when he went to the hearing Friday, of testifying as to his innermost thoughts about our space effort or the need for larger funds.

"I intended to evade the subject if I could because I didn't want to get involved in the controversy that I know will be the result. But the whole atmosphere of the hearing convinced me this position was impossible, particularly the insistence on the part of the Senators that we say exactly what we thought."

NO REFLECTIONS ON BOSS

Mr. Johnson hastily added he did not wish to cast any reflections on other witnesses or on his boss, Secretary of Defense McElroy, when he told of a 30 percent cut made in his original budget requests.

"I am very sure in my own mind that Secretary McElroy never intended for anyone to be untruthful on the witness stand. I don't think there is a real attempt here to gag anybody."

He hasn't seen Secretary McElroy since his Friday appearance, but he hopes to take up with him this week his request for $150 million supplemental funds to be distributed over the whole space program in the current fiscal years.

CONTRARY TO POLICY

Mr. Johnson points out that he had no correspondence with the Defense Secretary such as the memorandum signed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff in which they approved with reservations the military budget. He read the Stans letter (a communication from Budget Director Maurice H. Stans urging Pentagon officials to support the budget as written) but regarded it as information only.

"I don't know whether there is much chance of getting it," he said of his dramatic public request for more money. "All we can do is work within the Department of Defense. At the moment, it is contrary to policy.

"I don't know how we can get it unless there are other forces in existence that would add pressure to it—a growing sentiment in the country that the space effort ought to be pushed very vigorously in line with the dire danger we are in from the Russian threat."

Calling himself "no crusader, no man riding a white horse," Mr. Johnson expressed the hope that the whole problem should be thrashed out with the Congress, and a solution should come about from a clearing of the air. He will be glad to testify whenever he is asked.

"I suspect I stand alone right now."

But Mr. Johnson, who was appointed by Secretary McElroy, insists he has no regrets, would do it all over again.

He was converted by the Senate investigation of exactly where we stand.

"I think it started out to have some political overtones. But, honestly, when I got in there and heard the Senators, I was convinced that they are genuinely concerned. Even though it may have started out as a political matter, I think it isn't that any more."

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, it is becoming increasingly clear that the presentation of the Department of Defense budget requirements, as it is now handled, is a directed one, with matters of fiscal policy the dominant consideration.

In this connection, no better confirmation of the truth of that statement has been made than the editorial in Aviation Week of February 2, 1959, entitled "The Familiar Mixture."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FAMILIAR MIXTURE

The fiscal 1960 defense budget is the familiar mixture found in similar budgets of the past 4 years. It is not adequate to meet the current and future defense requirements of this Nation nor adequate to regain or maintain a clear-cut margin of significant superiority in the technological race with the Soviet Union. Neither is it a drastic attempt to reduce our present defense posture by affecting large and critical economies through forced reductions or weapons production curtailment.

As usual, there is a somewhat pathetic attempt to substitute bold ringing phrases in the budget message for the vital dollars and priorities in the budget itself. For example, the budget cheerfully notes that more B–58 supersonic bombers will be purchased in fiscal 1960 than in 1959. This, of course, is true, but the actual figure is an increase of only 4 from the 36 B–58's programed for fiscal 1959 to 40 for the next fiscal year. This stretchout of the B–58 production program is typical of how fiscal policies can vitiate technical capability. By the time the B–58 begins to reach a true operational capability with Strategic Air Command under a less than four-a-month production program, it will be all too easy and perhaps logical to wash it out completely on the grounds of obsolescence. This has been the history of several promising weapon systems developed in good technical time but stretched to death by budget maneuvers.

Cancellation of the Regulus II Navy submarine-based supersonic missile is another good example of this false economy that looks neat and tidy on a balance sheet but actually cuts a vital portion of our atomic delivery capability. The Regulus II would have provided the Navy with an operational submarine-based atomic delivery capability in the immediate future. It has been canceled presumably because Polaris is just around the corner. Polaris is coming along well, but it is far from just around the corner. In the intervening years, the United States loses a type of operational capability for its strategic deterrent force that offers mobility and dispersal.

Another interesting point to note in passing is the way facts that are subject to vigorous official denials in previous years inevitably leak out in the budgets of following years. In early 1957 we wrote that the fiscal 1958 Air Force budget was a fraud because it promised to support a 128-wing structure when actually it was capable of handling only 120 wings at the time and would force a reduction below 110 wings within 2 years. This was vehemently denied by responsible officials including Mr. Donald Quarles, then Secretary of the Air Force and now Deputy Secretary of Defense. Tables published with the fiscal 1960 budget show the Air Force reduced to 102 wings.

The twisting of the fact that the first Atlas ICBM's will be delivered to Strategic Air Command before July into an impression that this Nation will have an operational ICBM capability of any significance during this year is another example of how official weasel wording and innuendo combine to lure the American public into a false sense of complacency. The total Atlas production program scheduled for Strategic Air Command is ridiculously small in terms of real deterrent force. The Titan ICBM is at least a year behind the Atlas in development and has yet to make its first successful test flight.

The decision to abandon all manned interceptors for air defense purposes contained in the fiscal 1960 budget is another policy that will rise to haunt its progenitors if a test of military strength comes during the next 5 years. Defensive missile capability, including both the Army Nike-Hercules and USAF Bomarc, is certainly improving over ranges under 300 miles. But both for reliability standards, which missiles are far from achieving, and the ranges at which an enemy attack must begin to be whittled away, only manned interceptors will be able to do the job. To completely abandon this capability for the future is a grave error.

The budget also tells us that procurement of the Thor and Jupiter IRBM will cease in 1960, leaving us with an operational capacity of five Thor squadrons and three Jupiter squadrons deployed in England, Italy, Alaska, and possibly Greece. This capability is sufficient to make the areas involved prime enemy targets but not sufficient to add a significant force to our overall strategic deterrent. In fact, the land-based IRBM program could well become a prime example of how vast sums of money can be hastily spent without achieving any significant new military capability.

Another bookkeeping trick designed to cloak the true state of affairs is the new budget account for research and development which lumps all development and testing facility and operational money in with the research and development funds to make a grandiose total of $3 billion. Probably less than 10 percent of this total is really being earmarked for basic research and state-of-the-art advances not tied to specific weapon system development. The research and development effort has actually been losing ground despite what looks like an increasing budget because the real research funds have remained almost constant in the face of a tremendously increasing requirement while the budget picture has been rosied by these accounting tricks.

Major bright spot in the budget is the emphasis finally being placed on space exploration with a total of $800 million allocated for this purpose for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and the Defense Department's Advanced Research Projects Agency. Why this space exploration effort continues to be split by an artificial military-civil distinction is a question not yet satisfactorily explained. There is already the ferment of a bitter congressional debate over the fiscal 1960 defense budget. We doubt if anybody will seriously make much of a case for it being really adequate to meet the military problems of the future. Its defenders will probably rely on the twin fantasies that we really face no threat from the Soviet Union because their scientific, military, and economic advances are pure fiction and that we really "can't afford" what is necessary to insure our survival as a nation.

But mere debate over the size of the fiscal 1960 defense budget will not solve the basic problem facing this Nation. Nothing less than an aroused and dynamic official leadership willing to grasp the challenge of the future rather than simply preserve the aura of the past is necessary to alter our present course of apathetic drift into decline.

ROBERT HOTZ.

RETIREMENT OF DISTRICT HIGHWAY DIRECTOR J. N. ROBERTSON

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, Mr. Jack Robertson, of the city of Washington, has recently retired, after 42 years' service with the Highway Department of the city of Washington, D.C. Mr. Robertson not only contributed his efforts and intelligence to the welfare of proper highways in the city of Washington, but some 3 or 4 years ago he was president of the American Road Builders Association, and hence he contributed to the general program of highways throughout the country.

The Evening Star yesterday published an editorial with reference to the services of this gentleman, and this morning the Washington Post and Times Herald of this city also published an editorial in this regard. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the two editorials be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico?

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star, Feb. 4, 1959]

ROBERTSON'S RETIREMENT

The Commissioners are facing a tremendously tough job in finding a successor for Jack Robertson as city Highway Director. "J. N." has been synonymous with Washington highways for so long that he seems to most of us to symbolize them.

The reason, of course, is that that's exactly the way Mr. Robertson feels himself. As he recalls, he never has wanted to do anything but build roads here from the time he was big enough to talk. A third-generation Washingtonian, he knows the city like the back of his hand and loves every bit of it. The District has reason to be proud of Mr. Robertson's accomplishments in the national field of highway legislation and administration. Locally, his contributions during 42 years in the Department are too numerous to single out. Just look out the window of your car the next time you drive; the chances are that Jack Robertson built—or rebuilt—the road you're on.

More than an exceptional public official, however, Mr. Robertson is a gentleman and a friend to thousands of Washingtonians who treasure the relationship. His mild temperament seldom gave way except in battles with planning and park officials over highway locations. When there were two sides to a question and one of them involved highways, however, Jack never faked any sympathy for the other side. His job was to build highways—and that's what he did.

It's no surprise that "J. N." and Mrs. Robertson intend to remain in Washington. Anything else would be unthinkable. Furthermore, our guess is that retirement isn't going to take him out of the picture. We'll look forward to hearing from him on the state of our highways for some time to come.

[From the Washington Post and Times Herald, Feb. 5, 1959]

"J. N." STEPS DOWN

The retirement of District Highway Director J. N. Robertson, on his doctor's advice, caps an unusually colorful and productive career in the service of the District government. For some 12 years, first as Deputy Director and later as Director, Mr. Robertson has had the challenging task of keeping the Capital City's highway arteries adequate for the needs of a swiftly growing Capital City. He leaves at a time when half a billion dollars' worth of projects are scheduled for early construction and when another like amount is being urgently recommended to cope with 1980 requirements. While urging public support for this program, Mr. Robertson also wisely insists upon greater attention to parking and transit requirements.

He can recall with some amusement the advice of friends, a year after he joined the Department in 1917, that he look around for another job since the District's street system was about completed. For 42 years he has seen many forecasts like that one overtaken by events. To the task of staying as closely abreast of needs as possible, he has brought great energy, administrative, and engineering skill and a talent for good public and congressional relations in a combination that will be difficult to replace.

PROPOSED TAXES ON GASOLINE

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I should like to call to the attention of the Senate several resolutions adopted by the Kansas Oil Men's Association at its 44th annual convention in Wichita, January 11 to 13.

These resolutions deal with proposed taxes on gasoline and express their opposition to the increase.

The president of the Kansas Oil Men's Association is Dean Spencer, of Oakley, Kans., and the resolutions were presented to the convention by William B. Dalton, chairman of the resolutions committee.

I ask unanimous consent that these resolutions be made a part of these remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Reports from Washington, D.C., say Congress will be asked to raise the Federal gasoline tax 1½ to 2 cents per gallon, because the Highway Trust Fund is steadily approaching a deficit.

With the creation of the Highway Trust Fund which is nurtured solely by highway users, all automotive taxes were paid into this fund. It amounted to more than $3.6 billion for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958.

Of this amount $2.1 billion was allocated to the Highway Trust Fund and the remaining $1.5 billion was channeled into the general fund of the U.S. Treasury and was used for other purposes than building the Federal highway system: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the money taken into the general fund of the U.S. Treasury should be returned to the Highway Trust Fund and that no additional automotive or gasoline taxes be levied.

We believe the Federal highway program is of importance to the defense and economy of our Nation and recommend that it be kept on schedule and that any additional funds needed be taken from the general fund of the U.S. Treasury.

We urge the Congress of the United States to amend the present gasoline tax law by adding a provision whereby it would be possible for the victims of a gasoline loss by fire or other casualty to secure a refund of the Federal gasoline tax on such gasoline, so lost.

In case of such loss, the owner is put in the position of having paid the tax but is unable to resell the gasoline through no fault of his own.

We believe the 27½ percent depletion allowance is fully justified in drilling for oil on account of the great cost and risk in searching for oil and heartily recommend it be continued.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL'S AUDIT REPORT ON THE TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement I have prepared on the controversy between the Comptroller General and the Westinghouse Electric Corp.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAPEHART

The Comptroller General's audit report on the Tennessee Valley Authority, which was submitted to Congress on January 15, 1959, stated that TVA has run into serious problems with 14 turbogenerators bought from Westinghouse Electric Corp. According to a United Press-International News story, the report indicated the turbine generators failed to meet heat rates specified in the contract, and indicated that there had been mechanical difficulties in the turbines.

Shortly after the publication of the UPI story on the audit report, TVA issued a statement further explaining these difficulties, making it clear that the problems were much less serious than one would think from reading the initial news accounts. These reports disturbed me, and I have inquired into this matter. In the interest of fairness to all concerned, I want to state publicly what I have learned.

Several years ago, when TVA began to expand its steam generating facilities, it sought the most technologically advanced steam turbines obtainable. Westinghouse Electric Corp. got the contract to design and to build 14 turbogenerators for installation in TVA's Shawnee and Kingston generating stations. These machines were to utilize a combination of steam pressures and temperatures in the highest range yet attempted and on which there had been very little actual operating experience. The machines were to be of highly advanced design and would achieve great progress in reducing the cost of generating electricity.

After more than half of these turbine generators had been placed in operation, tests were performed in 1955 which showed that they did not meet the guaranteed efficiency of performance by about 2 percent. All of the machines have been performing for several years and performing well, but they have had to use slightly larger amounts of fuel than had been anticipated when the designs were conceived.

Westinghouse has undertaken the necessary steps to correct the efficiency rates, and is in the process of supplying new parts at its own expense for modifying all 14 of the TVA machines. When the modifications are complete, TVA will have 14 turbogenerators with efficiencies equal to or better than it could have obtained anywhere in the world.

The mechanical difficulties referred to in the Comptroller General's report involved the turbine spindles, but had nothing to do with the efficiency problem. The metallurgical application of these turbine spindles was, in the opinion of qualified engineers, the most advanced then known for such purpose.

After the 14 machines for TVA were completed, Westinghouse learned from experience with a similar machine sold to another utility customer, that with the terrific temperatures and speeds involved, the spindles might in time develop faults and resulting mechanical difficulties. These mechanical difficulties might not have been the contractual responsibility of Westinghouse, but in keeping with the high standards under which American manufacturers of steam turbine generating equipment operate, Westinghouse voluntarily brought this matter to TVA's attention, and is in the process of modifying or replacing all of the spindles on the 14 generators in question. Thus the mechanical difficulties referred to by the Comptroller General's report were recognized by Westinghouse in time to take corrective action although there was necessarily some inconvenience to TVA.

My reason for making this statement is merely to clarify what I consider to be an unfortunate reference to a matter which was being taken care of between TVA and Westinghouse Electric Corp.

While they attracted no attention in the press at that time, these matters were referred to in the Comptroller General's audit report on TVA a year ago.

These highly technical problems were fully reported and discussed in professional engineering circles more than a year ago. They are the kind of things which can happen as major strides in technological progress are achieved in any field. The business relationship between TVA and Westinghouse has been characterized fully by good faith and responsibility, and I think it is most unfortunate that the Comptroller General's report and the newspaper accounts of the report failed to relate all of the background which was necessary to convey an accurate public impression of this matter.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, has morning business been concluded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further morning business, morning business is concluded.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HOUSING ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 57) to extend and amend laws relating to the provision and improvement of housing and the renewal of urban communities, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am informed that the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] has two amendments on which he desires a record vote. One involves reducing the number of public housing units from 35,000 to 17,500, and the other involves urban renewal.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. In order that the record may be straight, let me say that there are definitely two amendments on which I desire a yea-and-nay vote. Perhaps there will be others.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am referring now to those two only.

Mr. CAPEHART. I am hopeful that the manager on the other side will accept perhaps three amendments, but there are definitely two on which I desire yea-and-nay votes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Indiana may send his two amendments to the desk, that they be reported, and that there be allotted 30 minutes of debate on each amendment, to be equally divided between the author of the amendment, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, may we have the first amendment stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 124, lines 1 and 2, strike out "thirty-five thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "seventeen thousand five hundred".

On page 124, line 7, before the word "additional", insert "or seventeen thousand five hundred, as the case may be,".

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we may have the yeas and nays ordered on the amendment now reported.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, for the benefit of all Senators I announce that at the conclusion of 30 minutes we shall have a vote on the pending amendment. Then the next amendment will be reported, under the unanimous-consent agreement entered into.

The Senator from Indiana will then be recognized, and we will have 30 minutes of debate on that amendment, to be equally divided. At that time I shall ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment. If the Senator from Indiana will support me, I am sure we will be able to move ahead with a vote on that amendment.

Mr. CAPEHART. I shall be glad to support the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator from Indiana allot to himself?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield myself 10 minutes, to start with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, the pending amendment would reduce the public housing starts in fiscal year 1960 to 17,500. The pending bill calls for 35,000 additional authorization, plus, I believe, restoration of approximately 10,000 units which were lost to the program and the extension of the balance of the 1956 act of approximately 30,000 units, or a total of about 75,000 units. The amendment would reduce the additional authorization to 17,500.

I would not offer the amendment if I thought for a moment it would interfere with the program and if it would hinder public housing. It will not do that. I am informed that there is available sufficient authorization to do all that we will be able to do during the next 10 months.

I come back to what I said repeatedly yesterday: Do we or do we not want to take each amendment and each bill as it comes before the Senate and apply this formula to it, namely, can we reduce expenditures under each bill and amendment without interfering or hurting the program, in order that we may have a balanced budget during the fiscal year 1960?

That is what the question amounts to. We can do it or not do it. Senators who vote against the amendment will be saying, in effect, that they do not care whether we have a balanced budget. I cannot go along with that idea. As a Senator said yesterday, he is interested in both a balanced budget and a balanced economy. No one is more interested in a balanced budget and in a balanced economy than I am, and I say here is an opportunity whereby we can have both.

The fact is that we could come close to getting both if we voted the amendment into the bill. If a bill is voted that will reduce expenditures, we may come close to getting a balanced economy. We must give some thought to the taxpayers of America. We must give some thought to the fact that some day we must pay off our national debt. We must give some thought to the necessity of some day reducing taxes. We must also give some thought to the contemplation that some day we must balance the budget. It seems to me that the housing bill is a good place to start, because, not referring to public housing, housing starts in the month of December were on the basis of 1,400,000 for the year, which will make it either the best year in history, or the second best year.

At the moment we have 115,000 public housing units, which are under contract but not yet completed. In all the history of the legislation we have constructed, over a period of 12 or 15 years, 444,173 units in which people are actually living. A little more than one-fourth of that number are under construction, and into which people will move in the future. In other words, the process of public housing is a slow process.

In that connection I should like to give the Senate examples from two of our largest cities. Let us take, for example, Philadelphia. In that city, under management—which means that people are living in the public housing units—there is a total of 10,151 units, with people living in them. That is the total number constructed in Philadelphia since the beginning of the program many years ago. As I have said, those are units in which people are living. The number of units under construction is 565. The number of units under reservation is 2,247. Units in ACC, I presume under contract, number 5,146. The total for Philadelphia is 7,342. That is a total number of 10,151 units which are occupied.

Why should we unbalance our budget and burden our taxpayers when it is not going to do any good particularly?

I am advised that the term "ACC" means credited, but not contracted for. There are so many new initials in use now that it is hard to keep up with them.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. What is the total number?

Mr. CAPEHART. Five thousand one hundred and forty-six. If so many housing units are needed in Philadelphia, why have not the city fathers taken advantage of the 5,146 units which have been authorized by Congress, and which could be built and could be handled? I am not criticizing the city fathers of Philadelphia. I know it takes time to do these things. It takes time on the part of city councils. It requires clearing the ground, and so forth.

That is my point. We can well reduce the number and eliminate some of the plans at the moment without in any way interfering with the program.

Chicago has under management—meaning that people have moved into the housing units during the last 14 years—17,027 units; units under construction, 995; units under reservation, 2,959; units as to which the city fathers have not as yet made up their minds, or have not been able to handle, but which Congress has authorized, 8,571—almost half as many units as have been built in Chicago.

I am not talking against the program; I am simply trying to inject a little good, common, horse sense into the program, and to ask why we should spend the taxpayers' money to authorize such programs when they are not needed. I repeat: If I thought such programs were needed, I would favor them.

There are under management—that is, projects in which people are living—444,000 units. The total authorized by Congress is 585,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 10 minutes of the Senator from Indiana has expired.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I allot myself another 2 minutes. Does the unanimous-consent agreement provide for 30 minutes to a side?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is 30 minutes to be equally divided.

Mr. CAPEHART. I allot myself 2 more minutes.

Mr. President, a good argument can be made that thousands and thousands of public housing units are needed for underprivileged and low-income people in the United States. I could agree with that. But those units will not be built particularly as the result of this bill. Is it not better, then, to reduce the amounts provided for in S. 57?

I tried yesterday to eliminate the entire 35,000 provided in S. 57. I lost that vote. Now I am asking that the 35,000 be reduced to 17,500.

Are we or are we not interested in balancing the budget? Are we or are we not interested in a sound dollar? Are we or are we not interested in reducing expenditures, and particularly in doing all these things when to do so will not materially—I repeat: materially—interfere with the housing program?

We are not asking that public housing be eliminated. We are not saying that a year or 2 years from now we might not be justified in authorizing X number of units, perhaps 35,000; I do not know. I am not one who does not recognize the need to help the people in the big cities who must live in slums. I do not say that at all. But those people are taxpayers, too. They ought to be interested in balancing the budget, and they ought to be interested in a sound economy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to the eloquent remarks of the distinguished Senator from Indiana. I shall do what I can to rebut them.

In my judgment, the pending amendment, if adopted, would not only hinder public housing—in this I find myself in disagreement with the Senator from Indiana—but it would come pretty close to crippling the urban renewal program, because that program requires safe and sanitary shelter for all persons displaced by slum clearance. Without additional public housing units, safe and sanitary shelter cannot be obtained.

The Senator refers to a large number of housing starts last year. This is, indeed, an encouraging matter. But I venture the suggestion that not one of those private housing starts can be of any use at all to the low-income families for whom public housing is the only alternative to continuing to live in slums, in unsafe and insanitary dwellings. They can't afford the private housing.

The Senator from Indiana referred to the situation in my home city of Philadelphia and has noted that there are a great many public housing units in that city, with more under construction and more under reservation, and still more credited under contract.

I used to be the mayor of Philadelphia. I am familiar with this program. I do not hesitate to say that as a result of the urban renewal program, the Federal highway program, and the displacement of families by other governmental programs, the city of Philadelphia will need in the foreseeable future about twice as many units of public housing as are now under reservation or construction. This is because the Federal highway program and the urban renewal program are just getting under way. People have hardly begun to be displaced as a result of those programs.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on my time?

Mr. CLARK. I yield on the Senator's time, yes.

Mr. CAPEHART. Is it not true that Philadelphia has 5,146 units which can be allocated to that purpose at the moment, units which have already been authorized?

Mr. CLARK. They are in the process of being allocated right now.

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes; for the next 12 months.

Mr. CLARK. That number is not nearly enough. The authorization which would be made under the bill would not really reach the status of being under contract for a year or two, so that the impact of the proposed legislation on the 1960 budget is minimal, if it exists at all. I shall come to that in a minute.

The way these programs are operated, there is a long time between the authorization and the actual expenditure of any money. One reason for that, in my judgment, is unnecessary redtape. But much of it is due to necessary precautions, to make certain that the sites are properly selected and the housing is constructed in accordance with standards and specifications of decency and economy.

Getting back to Philadelphia, we will need about twice as many public housing units as are presently contemplated, as the urban renewal and highway programs get under way.

This is likewise true throughout the country. The testimony before the Committee on Banking and Currency was, in my opinion, clear that there is a need for approximately 250,000 additional units of public housing over and above the number presently authorized in the next 5 years to meet the needs of the urban renewal program, the highway program, and other governmental action, and those 10 million families who at present live in substandard dwellings throughout the country and who may not be affected by the other programs at all. So the need is there, and it is clear.

The testimony before the committee on behalf of the American Municipal Association, the United States Conference of Mayors, and the National Association of Housing and Redevelopment Officials indicated support for my bill, which is far more drastic than the bill which was reported by the committee. My bill would have freed for construction 190,000 additional units to be built as the demand developed. The modest proposal in the bill reported by the committee is for only 35,000 units, with a pickup of those not yet authorized.

We should face squarely the question of the budget. We should balance the budget. I am in accord with the Senator from Indiana in that regard. But the way to balance the budget is to provide the revenues necessary to make America strong at home and respected abroad; not by pennypinching measures which could have no other effect than to leave us in the condition of inferiority abroad, and with a second-class America to be handed on to our children and our grandchildren.

I thank the Senator from Alabama for having yielded me so much time. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Indiana will be rejected, as was its substantially similar predecessor last night.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama has 8 minutes remaining; the Senator from Indiana has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Last year the bill which was reported by the Senate committee provided 35,000 units to continue the program. In the compromise which was reached on the floor of the Senate, the number was reduced to 17,500.

This year, when I introduced the bill, I followed the Senate's compromise, and included the 17,500 figure. However, after hearing the testimony, the Senate Banking and Currency Committee voted to increase the number to 35,000.

Mr. President, I submit that, under the evidence which was given to our committee, it certainly would not be going too far or be at all out of line to provide for the 35,000 units.

I am not sure, but I do not believe any Member has placed in the RECORD the table which appears on page 38 of the report on the bill. That table shows the number of units and the standing of the whole program at the present time. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to have the table printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The status of authorization under the Housing Act of 1956 is as follows:

	Dwelling units
Number authorized by Housing Act of 1956 (as of Dec. 31, 1958)	70,000
1st-year program (Aug. 1, 1956–July 31, 1958):
Number authorized	35,000
Number under contract	24,960
Number lost to program	10,040
2d-year program (July 1, 1957–June 30, 1959):
Number authorized	35,000
Number under contract	4,991
(As of Dec. 31, 1958:)
Number available until June 30, 1959	30,009
Pending applications:
Reservation issued	34,327
Applications in process	17,666
Total in process	51,993

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] has said, some authorized units have not yet been constructed. However, the testimony given to our committee was that by June 30 of this year, every unit now authorized will have been placed under contract. That is the point for us to remember. It means that if we do not now provide for additional units after June 30 it will not be possible to place under contract any more units during the next 12 months, the next fiscal year.

Furthermore, we are now providing for a 2-year extension of the existing program. That does not mean that the entire 35,000 units have to be used up in one fiscal year; but it allows orderly planning and orderly allocation of those units.

Mr. President, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] has so well pointed out, and as has been pointed out many times by other Members on this floor, under the law a community is required to show, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Urban Renewal, that adequate housing that is decent, safe, and sanitary will be made available for those who are forced out of areas involved in slum clearance. In other words, the community is charged with seeing to it that decent, safe, and sanitary housing is available for each of the families displaced from urban renewal areas.

It is true that a great number of them can be taken care of in private housing; in fact, we have established programs to meet that requirement insofar as that can be done. We set up the FHA section 221 program essentially for that purpose; and those who own property in a slum area, and who live there, ordinarily get for their property an amount of money sufficient to enable them to buy one of the section 221 houses. They are low-cost houses; the maximum amount that FHA can insure under this program is $10,000.

But we must remember that a high percentage, if I correctly recall the figures given to us, were unable to pay an economic rent. Well, Mr. President, I was about to say it was 22 percent. It may be higher than that, as given to us by the Housing and Home Finance Agency. I shall ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether they said 22 percent of the families displaced from urban renewal areas were unable to pay an economic rent.

Mr. CLARK. It is my understanding that the percentage was larger than that.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That may very well be true. I am sorry I do not have the exact figure at my fingertips. I am told by Mr. Cash, the staff director, that approximately 50 percent would be eligible. Certainly a large percentage of them cannot obtain decent housing unless public housing units are available.

So it is almost essential that every city and every town which has an urban-renewal project have some—some, not necessarily a great amount—public housing.

By means of this bill, all we are trying to do is provide what we consider to be the minimum and the necessary amount to meet those requirements and to enable this program to be carried on in an orderly way, meeting only the minimum requirements.

Mr. President, I earnestly hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana request unanimous consent that the time required for a quorum call not be charged to the time available to either side under the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. CAPEHART. I so request, Mr. President.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I join in that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] is absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is absent in his State to attend the funeral of a friend.

The Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] has 2 minutes remaining, and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] has 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me 1 minute?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, two yea-and-nay votes have been ordered, one of which will be on the amendment now pending, which is imminent. The other vote will be approximately 30 minutes from now.

Very shortly I shall send to the desk an amendment for myself, for the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the chairman of the committee, and for the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], which would eliminate $125 million from the bill for the so-called college housing guarantee fund, and which would reduce the $400 million amount presently in the bill for college housing to $300 million.

It is my understanding that the administration desires only $200 million for that item, and it is contemplated that perhaps an amendment to provide $200 million will be offered.

We will ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment offered for the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], and myself, and for any other Senators who may desire to join.

We think we ought to go as far as possible to meet the administration halfway. We ought to be reasonable. We all want to be prudent.

I want all Senators to be on notice that as soon as the Senate acts on the second amendment we shall seek recognition for the purpose of reducing, first, $125 million from the guarantee fund, and, second, for the purpose of reducing the $400 million to $300 million for the college housing fund.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield, if I have time.

Mr. CAPEHART. I have a printed amendment which has been on the desk a couple of days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Texas has expired. Is the Senator from Indiana using his own time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield the Senator 1 additional minute.

Mr. CAPEHART. The amendment I offered has been pending a couple of days. That amendment would reduce the provisions relating to the college housing fund by $200 million, and the guarantee fund. Does the Senator say he is willing to accept——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No. We are not going to accept anything. We are going to reduce the amount in the bill from $400 million to $300 million if the majority agrees to do so. If the majority agrees with the Senator from Indiana, and he desires to reduce the amount $200 million, we can get a vote on that.

Mr. CAPEHART. As the manager on this side of the aisle, though I cannot speak for everybody, I would say that since the Senator is willing to take $125 million out, while I am asking for a reduction of $200 million, we would accept the compromise offered by the senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Very well. We will proceed to that matter as soon as we dispose of these other two amendments. It is our purpose to offer an amendment striking $125 million for the guarantee fund, and reducing the college housing fund from $400 million to $300 million.

Mr. CAPEHART. That would be a difference of only $75 million between that which my amendment would provide for and that which the Senator is suggesting. If it is agreeable to my colleagues, we will be willing to accept that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would surely hope that the Senator from Indiana would feel that way about it, because I think what we want to do is not create an issue but resolve issues. The distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] was very persuasive with me last evening when he urged me to give consideration to proposals to reduce the housing funds. I hope the Senator has followed our comments, because after adjournment last night, the Senator was urging that this course be followed.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired. The Senator from Indiana has 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 1 minute?

Mr. DIRKSEN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The time would have to come from the time of the Senator from Indiana, because I yielded the Senator my time. Does the Senator not have some time left?

Mr. CAPEHART. I have 2 minutes left. I should like to have at least a minute.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. Will the Senator tell me what he would like to talk about?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I asked the Senator from Texas to yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator from Texas has no time remaining.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, in view of the fact that I have yielded to my colleagues rather freely to discuss their position on our time, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to yield my friend from Kentucky 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Kentucky is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, last night, after the Senate reduced the veterans direct loan fund from $300 million to $150 million, it occurred to me that other reductions could be made in the bill, without doing damage to it. It is a fact—that the majority can do as it wishes with the bill. For that reason, I did go to the Senator from Texas—the majority leader—and I urged him that the greatest responsibility be exercised, and that further cuts could be made, considering the large amount in the Senate bill and the large difference between the administration and Senate bills. I told the Senator that I hoped he would take the initiative on the other side of the aisle to reduce the large sums presented by the Senate committee. I am glad the Senator from Texas has taken this action, and I commend him for his leadership.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am always delighted to follow the Senator's advice when he is being constructive, as I usually find him to be. I think this is the constructive course to follow. I hope by doing this we can get some housing, instead of an issue.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It was my understanding that prior to the call of the roll, the distinguished Senator from Alabama had 2 minutes remaining and the distinguished Senator from Indiana had 1 minute remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Alabama was used by the majority leader.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That was 15 minutes ago. I am wondering about some of these amplified minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In addition, the majority leader asked unanimous consent for 1 minute, the time not to be taken out of the time for either side.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be given 1 minute, after the Senator from Indiana concludes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, we have entered into an agreement with the majority leader to a reduction of $125 million in college housing, although my proposed amendment, which was printed and is lying on the table, would reduce it $200 million. This is certainly a step in the right direction.

We now have an opportunity, with respect to the amendment now under consideration, to cut the public housing units from 35,000 to 17,500, without interfering one iota with the public housing program in an effort to balance the 1960 budget. That is the reason why Senators should vote for the amendment. I urge every Senator to vote for the amendment.

We are reducing by $125 million the college housing, and also the guarantee fund. We are beginning to make some progress, and I thank my colleagues for assisting us in making that progress.

Mr. KEATING rose.

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield to the Senator from New York for a question.

Mr. KEATING. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana whether a reduction in the public housing provision will in any way affect urban renewal.

Mr. CAPEHART. In my best judgment it will not. I do not see how it could.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the Senator yield? It would reduce the authorization for public housing units from 35,000 to 17,500, would it not?

Mr. CAPEHART. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In other words, it would cut the authorization in two.

Mr. CAPEHART. It would cut the 35,000 to 17,500.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That would be half.

Mr. CAPEHART. We do not think the 17,500 units are needed, but in order to affect a compromise we are willing to go along.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Anyone who does want public housing would be interested.

Mr. CAPEHART. That is correct.

Mr. KEATING. My question was whether that would affect urban renewal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time for debate has expired.

The Senator from Illinois asked and was granted unanimous consent to address the Senate for 1 minute.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I only wish to put before the Senate what I think are uncontroverted figures.

There are presently 444,000 occupied public housing units. There are 30,000 units presently under construction. There are another 81,000 which are authorized, on which work is not under way. This means that we have plenty of authority, and nobody has demonstrated the need for the additional authority involved in this request for 35,000 units.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have only 1 minute.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, which proposes to reduce the 35,000 units to 17,500 units, will prevail, because those are ample for all purposes.

I now yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania, if I have time.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator is incorrect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. I am afraid the Senator—inadvertently, of course—gave the Senate an erroneous impression when he referred to a large number of public housing units which were not under construction. All the units authorized for this year have been allocated. The sites have been selected. Most of the units will be under contract by July 1 of this year. There is a need, established by the testimony, for 250,000 additional units of public housing in the next 4 or 5 years.

I listened to what my good friend from New York said a minute or two ago. I reply to his question: If we do not get this authorization we will run into grave danger for the urban renewal program, and it will slow down and in some localities come to a halt.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That does not rebut the figures of the Senator from Illinois. The record is exactly as I stated it, and as it was presented to the committee.

Mr. CLARK. The record will speak for itself.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for debate has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Am I correct in understanding that the question is on agreeing to the Capehart amendment to strike 35,000 public housing units from the bill and insert in lieu thereof 17,500?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] is absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. If present and voting, the Senator from Oregon would vote "nay" and the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "yea."

Mr. DIRKSEN. I announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is absent in the State to attend the funeral of a friend.

The Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is detained on official business.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER]. If present and voting, the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "yea" and the Senator from Oregon would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 53, as follows:

YEAS—39

Aiken	Dirksen	Morton
Allott	Dworshak	Mundt
Anderson	Eastland	Prouty
Bennett	Ellender	Robertson

NOT VOTING—6

Beall	Kuchel	Martin
Bridges	Magnuson	Neuberger

So Mr. CAPEHART's amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. As I understand, under the unanimous-consent agreement, 30 minutes of debate will be allowed on the next amendment to be offered by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART]. I am informed that the Senator from Indiana does not expect to use all of his time, and that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] will not use all of his time. Therefore, I hope all Members of the Senate will be on notice that we may have a yea-and-nay vote very shortly. I ask that the yeas and nays be ordered on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TALMADGE in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 305 and insert the following:

SEC. 305. (a) Section 103(a) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by striking out the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The aggregate of capital grants with respect to all the projects of a local public agency on which contracts for capital grants have been made under this title shall not exceed the total amount obtained by adding together the amounts for each such project determined by multiplying its net project cost by the applicable percentage. Such percentage, which shall apply to each project receiving initial Federal recognition during the period specified, shall be 66⅔ per centum for the period prior to July 1, 1960; 60 per centum for the period between July 1, 1960, and June 30, 1961, inclusive; 55 per centum for the period between July 1, 1961, and June 30, 1962, inclusive; and 50 per centum for any time thereafter: Provided, That the percentage for any project for which no planning advance or grant is received and retained by the local public agency and which the Administrator, at the request of such agency, may approve on a three-fourths capital grant basis shall be 75 per centum, or such lesser percentage as the Administrator determines to be generally consistent with the percentage of net project costs hereunder applicable at the time to projects not so approved."

(b) The first sentence of section 103(b) of such act is amended by striking out all before the proviso and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The Administrator, on and after July 1, 1949, may, with the approval of the President, contract to make capital grants with respect to projects assisted under this title aggregating not to exceed $1,450,000,000, which limit shall be increased by $250,000,000 on July 1 in each of the years 1959, 1960, and 1961 and by $200,000,000 on July 1 in each of the years 1962, 1963, and 1964:".

(c) Section 104 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 104. Every contract for capital grants under this title shall require local grants-in-aid in connection with the projects involved which, together with the local grants-in-aid to be provided in connection with all other projects of the local public agency on which contracts for capital grants have theretofore been made, will be at least equal to the difference between the aggregate net project costs involved and the sum described in the second sentence of section 103(a)."

(d) The proviso in the first sentence of section 110(e) of such Act is hereby amended by striking out "second sentence" and inserting in lieu thereof "third sentence".

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, in order that we may accommodate all Senators and that they may understand just what we are talking about, I wish to say that we have been debating the subject of housing almost continually for the last 2 days, and I shall take only a minute to state it again. No one is trying to hinder any of the housing programs. We are not trying to eliminate any of the programs. All we are trying to do is take out of the bill X amount of money in order that we may balance the 1960 budget without in any way hindering or interfering with any of these programs. It is as simple as that.

I again wish to say, as a Senator, as a citizen, and as a taxpayer, that we ought to apply the same formula to every piece of proposed legislation that comes before us; namely, whether some money in every bill that comes before us cannot be eliminated without interfering with our programs, in order that we may make an effort to balance the budget.

The pending amendment would reduce the urban renewal authorization to $1,450 million. It is another opportunity for us to prove whether we want to reduce expenditures without hurting the program. It is not possible to go any faster. This is a 6-year program. If we find, 2 years from now, that our financial condition is better, that there are fewer calls upon us for national defense, that we are balancing the budget, and that our income is greater, we can at that time appropriate or authorize more money to go forward with what should be done.

That is all I will say on this subject. I have been discussing this housing legislation and various amendment now for a couple of days. The same principle applies to all of them. I am grateful to the distinguished majority leader for his compromise yesterday in reducing the $300 million to $150 million. At the moment we have an agreement that we will reduce the college housing program by $125 million, and eliminate another item. I am grateful for that. I wish the majority leader would compromise on these other matters. I hope Senators will go along with us. We can do it in all good conscience without hurting the program.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. Yesterday the Senator accepted a modification on a similar amendment, to the effect that the $250 million for the first year should become the figure for the last 3 years. In other words, the modification is to change the item of $200 million in the Senator's amendment to $250 million, so as to make it a uniform figure.

Mr. CAPEHART. I ask unanimous consent that I may modify the amendment accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, have not the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. May we find out what the purpose of the modification is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asked if there was objection to the unanimous-consent request. The Chair now recognizes the Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Reserving the right to object, I wish to hear what the modification is and what the purpose is. Perhaps I will not object.

Mr. BUSH. The modification is a very simple one. It moves in the direction of the Sparkman bill, not away from it. The amendment in question provides for $250 million a year for 3 years and $200 million a year for the next 3 years. The modification would provide $250 million each year for 6 years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have no objection.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so as to provide $250 million each year for 6 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is so modified.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Does the Senator's amendment as modified carry also the provision in the administration's recommendation to reduce Federal participation and increase State participation?

Mr. CAPEHART. That remains the same as it was in my original amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Does the Senator mean that it does?

Mr. CAPEHART. All I am agreeing to in my modification is to make the amount $250 million a year for 6 years.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator, I am afraid, did not correctly understand my question. I ask if his amendment to modify includes the administration proposal to decrease Federal participation and increase local participation.

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes; it does.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a very pertinent article entitled "Glaring Spending Differences," written by Peter Edson, and published in the Washington Daily News of February 5, 1959. Mr. Edson points out in his article the glaring differences in spending between the two major political parties. I think in light of the votes taken yesterday as well as those being taken today in the Senate, in line with trying to balance the budget, the article is most appropriate and timely.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GLARING SPENDING DIFFERENCES

(By Peter Edson)

That old gag about it being impossible to tell the difference between Republicans and Democrats is no good any more.

The principal difference is in ideas about the amount of money the Federal Government should spend, and whether the budget shall be kept in balance or operated at a deficit.

In three fields alone—Federal aid to education, airport construction, and housing—Democrats now propose spending $1.5 billion more than the Republican administration proposes for the next fiscal year. Over the full 6 or 7 years of the conflicting programs, the Democrats would spend $13 billion more.

In campaign speeches at Pittsburgh and Charleston last October 27, President Eisenhower identified the Democrats as "the spendthrift league" and accused them of "urging a raid on the taxpayers' dollars."

The charge was resentfully denied by Democratic orators. But from the way things are shaping up in the new session of Congress, the President's charge seems justified.

Take housing. The administration called for a $1.660 billion program, spread over 6 years. Senator JOHN SPARKMAN, Democrat, of Alabama, introduced a bill which would cost $2.965 billion, spread over 7 years.

For the fiscal year 1960, the Democrats' bill would cost $356 million more. Of this, $300 million would be for direct loans to veterans, on which the administration made no proposal.

The bill as passed by the Senate will still have to clear the House and a Senate-House conference committee to compromise differences. President Eisenhower will give no hint on whether he will sign or veto a bill that goes so far beyond his recommendations. But this will bring to a head the question of whether the Government will unbalance its budget and embark on deficit financing.

Take aid to airports. The administration program calls for $200 million spread over 4 years. The bill introduced by Senator A. S. MONRONEY, Democrat, of Oklahoma, calls for $575 million spread over 5 years.

Take Federal aids to education. The administration called for nothing beyond last year's National Defense Education Act. But Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, Democrat, of Montana, has introduced a bill for school construction and other benefits which would cost $1.1 billion the first year and increase by that amount or more to $4.7 billion the 4th year. The total cost would be $11.3 billion.

In the field of Government lending programs, the administration proposed $55 million for depressed areas suffering from chronic high unemployment. Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, Democrat, of Illinois, topped this with a $375 million program. President Eisenhower vetoed a similar bill last year.

All the foregoing illustrate differences in approach to spending bills. In addition, there are wide differences in Republican administration and Democratic congressional bills on labor legislation, civil rights, social security, atomic energy power development, space exploration, missile development, and foreign policy.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I call attention to one other matter. I wish every Senator would pay close attention to this. Many statements have been made to the effect that more authorization is needed for public housing. Let me read a statement by the Director of Public Housing:

We lost 10,000 units out of our last year's authorization because they were not requested by the local authorities and by reason of the fact that the housing bill was not enacted last year.

Mr. President, 10,000 units were lost last year because cities throughout the United States did not even request them. So we are authorizing more public housing and urban renewal than the people throughout the country can use. I can well understand that. This is not a criticism, because time is needed to do all these things. If we can do what I am proposing, and not hinder those programs, but still balance the budget, we ought to do it.

I say again that Congress is responsible, 100 percent, for unbalanced budgets, for deficits, and for national debts. It is not the President of the United States who is responsible. Congress alone authorizes the money and makes the appropriations. I do not ever again want to hear the complaint that the President of the United States or the administration, whether it be a Democratic or a Republican administration, is spending too much money and has unbalanced the budget, when Congress, and Congress alone, is responsible, not the President.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Can the Senator point out wherein Congress has ever voted more money for the foreign aid program than the President has requested? My impression is that it was pressure emanating from the White House which was responsible for the large foreign aid programs.

Mr. CAPEHART. That does not change my statement. My statement is that Congress, and Congress alone, is responsible for authorizations and appropriations. If Congress appropriates more money than is received in taxes by the Federal Government, then Congress is responsible for the deficits, because Congress sets the tax rates and appropriates the money.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senate tell me wherein Congress is responsible for the increases in interest rates which have added an extra $2 billion a year to financing the national debt?

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes. Congress is responsible for that, because there would not be a national debt if Congress had not appropriated the money. The able Senator from Louisiana knows that.

Mr. LONG. The debt would not be so large if there had not been a war. But what about all the increases in interest rates since then?

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator cannot deny that Congress, and Congress alone, appropriates the money. The President would not have one cent to spend if it were not appropriated by Congress.

Mr. LONG. Some of us who are opposed to appropriating outlandish sums for foreign aid would like to reduce the amount spent on the foreign aid program. We are against the tremendous increases in interest rates on the national debt. Some of us want to economize at different points. We do not see what the country is getting in return for all the increases in interest rates and the expenditure of money for foreign aid.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator from Louisiana is talking about foreign aid when the matter before the Senate is housing and urban renewal.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. We are operating under a unanimous consent agreement. I shall be happy to yield further to Senators on their own time.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a comment on this subject?

Mr. CAPEHART. Very well; I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Is it not true that high interest rates are a reflection of an inflationary period and deficit spending?

Mr. CAPEHART. The bulk of it is due to the $280 billion debt; also, interest rates have gone up.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. And they will continue to go up with deficit spending.

Mr. CAPEHART. But Congress has the authority, if it wants to use it, to set the interest rates.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, does the Senator decline to yield to Senators on this side of the aisle?

Mr. CAPEHART. No; I am happy to yield to the Senator from Texas. I am ready to vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not think any party has a monopoly on spending or saving or balancing the budget. I think most of this talk about these things is pure bunk.

I remind Senators that the Senate in the 85th Congress, by almost unanimous votes of both parties—by almost unanimous votes, if not unanimous, in each instance—voted to reduce the administration's—I could say the President's, but I do not want to get personal—the administration's appropriation requests, by a total of $5,600 million.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a letter from the clerk of the Senate Appropriations Committee, showing that the administration's requests for appropriations during the 85th Congress were reduced by Congress a total of $5,600 million, notwithstanding the fact that we gave the President $1 billion more than he requested in the field of defense.

Mr. President, it is also my impression—and I do not pass upon the merits or the justification of the request; Congress in due time will do that—that this administration, which speaks through television and the newspapers about spending, is asking Congress this year to appropriate $825 million more for foreign aid than Congress appropriated last year. I did not say $825,000, Mr. President, but $825 million. That is, in my language, a very substantial increase in spending in that field.

I do not question the motives or the integrity of anyone; I shall not even speak about the judgment as between parties. I have placed in the RECORD, however, the fact that Congress, with Republicans and Democrats voting alike, voted to reduce the administration's requests $5,600 million; and there were yea-and-nay votes on practically every appropriation bill in the 1st session of the 85th Congress, when Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey warned us that if we did not cut expenses we would have a depression that would curl our hair.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In just a moment. I understand that this is irritating to those who like to talk about other people's spending, but I want Senators to understand and realize that while there is talk about saving $20 million, $30 million, or $40 million, on programs to put a roof over someone's head, nevertheless those who criticize that are asking Congress to send abroad $825 million more than was sent last year.

If Senators do not know it, they should read the budget. I think the Congress will consider this with great care.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I refuse to yield further.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if it has got too hot to take, I yield the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. CAPEHART. To what?

Mr. BUSH. The Senator from Texas made a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I do not yield for that purpose, either. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, it is not too hot for me to take. I am only taking into account the fact that we have a unanimous-consent agreement.

The best speech I have heard on the floor of the Senate to prove my point that the Congress controls the budget and the appropriations was the one made just now by the able Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. Because he said the 85th Congress reduced them by, I believe, $5 billion, and that other Congresses had reduced them; and he said even the President had asked for more money—asked it of whom? Asked it of the Congress, Mr. President.

Therefore, the Senator from Texas has proved my point that the Congress has the right to reduce expenditures, and also has the right to increase them. The responsibility is 100 percent ours.

At no time during my remarks, either yesterday or today, have I said a word about either Democrats or Republicans. I have only been talking about the fact that it is the responsibility of the Congress—composed of both Democrats and Republicans—to balance the budget; and that the Congress, and only the Congress, has the authority to appropriate money. The RECORD will prove that I played no politics with that matter; I was appealing to all Senators, on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me, to permit me to commend him?

Mr. CAPEHART. I ask the Senator from Texas to wait just a minute, please.

Mr. President, I was appealing to both sides; and I am grateful to the Senator from Texas for proving my point, because he did prove my point. He proved that the 85th Congress had the courage to reduce the expenditures; and I congratulate him for defending me and protecting me, because he has proved my point 100 percent, namely, that only the Congress can appropriate money, and only the Congress can reduce appropriations. That is all I am trying to do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, let me congratulate the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TALMADGE in the chair). The time available to the Senator from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not yield just now from the time available to me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I withdraw my request, if some Senators do not want the letter published at this point in the RECORD. Instead, I shall circulate the letter in private. I ask unanimous consent to have the letter printed at this point in the RECORD. But if the printing of the letter in the RECORD will not be pleasing to some of my colleagues, I withdraw my request.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President——

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I have been promising to yield to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], who already has been delayed in keeping a luncheon engagement. So at this time I yield 4 minutes to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER].

THE ANNUAL MARDI GRAS BALL OF THE LOUISIANA STATE SOCIETY

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, following the rather tense situation which developed during the last few minutes, I shall refer now to something more pleasant.

Tomorrow evening, in the grand ballroom of the Sheraton-Park Hotel, the Louisiana State Society will stage its annual Mardi Gras ball. It is my privilege to serve this year as general chairman of the ball, which honors the men and women who produce, pack, and market golden Louisiana yams.

During the past few hours, quite a few prominent Louisianians have arrived in Washington for this occasion. I am particularly pleased that this year, as in years past, we are joined here in Washington by a bevy of lovely young ladies who are representing the major Louisiana fairs and festivals.

In this regard, Mr. President, it strikes me that the annual Mardi Gras ball here in Washington does more than merely provide an opportunity for Louisianians away from home to participate in a traditional Mardi Gras celebration. It does more than offer an opportunity for us to honor an outstanding Louisiana product. In all truth, Mr. President, the basic resource of any free society is its youth; our young people are the leaders of tomorrow. They are the ones to whom will fall the task, just a few years hence, of preserving and furthering the freedoms which our forefathers struggled to establish, and which we today struggle to maintain.

Therefore, not only as a salute to my State and to its products, but as a salute to the greatest single resource which any State can have—its youth—I wish to inform the Senate that the following young ladies, representatives of all Louisiana, are today the guests of our Louisiana congressional delegation and the Louisiana State Society:

NAME OF QUEEN AND HOME TOWN—FESTIVAL AND CITY HELD

Miss Gloria Allen, Leesville, La.; Holiday in Dixie Festival, Shreveport, La.

Miss Linda Lou Allen, Springhill, La.; Peach Festival, Ruston, La.

Miss Sally Bisso, New Orleans, La.; New Orleans Spirit of Mardi Gras, New Orleans, La.

Miss Catherine Bush, Bogalusa, La.; American Legion Festival, Bogalusa, La.

Miss Carolyn Ann Cherry, Franklin, La.; International Rice Festival, Crowley, La.

Miss Ann Giordano, Morgan City, La.; Shrimp Festival, Morgan City, La.

Miss Judy Haydel, Houma, La.; Fur Festival, Cameron, La.

Miss Barbara Jean Hayden, Kentwood, La.; Florida Parishes Festival, Kentwood, La.

Miss Sandra Hayes, Lafayette, La.; Louisiana Gulf Coast Oil Festival, Lafayette, La.

Miss Charlotte Hayman, Bogalusa, La.; Rose Festival, Bogalusa, La.

Miss Patricia Ann Healy, Covington, La.; Tung Blossom Festival, Covington, La.

Miss Lillian Hewell, New Iberia, La.; Delcambre Fishing Industry Festival, Delcambre, La.

Miss Jo Ann Hyde, Robert, La.; Louisiana Market Poultry Show, Alexandria, La.

Miss Joan LaBorde, Marksville, La.; Louisiana Livestock and Pasture Festival, Marksville, La.

Miss Marcy Lancaster, New Roads, La.; Louisiana Sugar Cane Festival, New Iberia, La.

Miss Raedonna Lantz, Egan, La.; Louisiana Farm Bureau Federation, Festival, Baton Rouge, La.

Miss Pauline Lasserre, Lafayette, La.; Southwest Louisiana Mardi Gras, Lafayette, La.

Miss Phylis LeBlanc, Delcambre, La.; Future Farmers of America, Baton Rouge, La.

Miss Sandra Lynn Lemoine, Ville Platte, La.; Cotton Festival, Ville Platte, La.

Miss Gladys Mestayer, New Iberia, La.; Louisiana Dairy Festival, Abbeville, La.

Miss Tommie Jean Rayburn, Bogalusa, La.; Louisiana Paper Festival, Bogalusa, La.

Miss Linda Marie Sullivan, Buras, La.; Louisiana Orange Festival, Buras, La.

Miss Sallye Ann Sumlin, Delhi, La.; North Louisiana Delta Festival, Bastrop, La.

Miss Camille Woodall, Oakdale, La.; Forest Festival, Winnfield, La.

LADIES OF THE COURT

Miss Mary Ann Basnight, Silver Spring, Md.

Miss Elizabeth Beyt, St. Martinsville, La.

Miss Corinne Boggs, New Orleans, La.

Miss Nina Claire Breaux, Carencro, La.

Miss Judith Rebecca Fletcher, Alexandria, La.

Miss Sandra Lynn Girouard, Kaplan, La.

Miss Tony Landry, New Iberia, La.

Miss Susan Virginia Phillips, Lafayette, La.

Miss Lynn Prescott, Bethesda, Md.

Miss May Del Tinsley, Point a La Hache, La.

Miss Elizabeth Coit, Newellton, La., champion yam cook of Louisiana.

In addition, Mr. President, I wish to pay particular tribute to a group of men and women who have worked tirelessly to assure the success of this year's Mardi Gras ball. They have been at my right hand during the many weeks the arrangements for this event have required.

First, Dr. Julian C. Miller, of Louisiana State University, the king of the Mardi Gras ball, and a man well known here in Washington. Dr. Miller's tireless research has made Louisiana yams one of my State's leading agricultural products.

Next, Miss Linda Guidry, of Opelousas, La., the queen of this year's ball. She was selected by the Louisiana yam industry; and, in order to reign over the Mardi Gras ball in Washington, she will lay aside her crown as Opelousas Yam Queen for Friday night only.

In this regard, Mr. President, another Louisiana beauty, Miss Arlene Howell, of Bossier City, recently named Miss United States in the Miss Universe contest, will join us at the ball tomorrow night, to replace, for that night only, Miss Guidry, as representative of the Louisiana Yambilee.

Finally, but by no means least, the members of the king's committee, who are representative of the vigorous leadership which characterizes today's growing Louisiana; are the following: Mr. R. J. Castille, of Lafayette, La., chairman; Mr. J. J. Arceneaux, of Opelousas, La.; Mr. A. D. Miller, of Lafayette, La.; Dr. G. A. Ackal, of New Iberia, La.; Mr. A. A. Gonsoulin, of Sunset, La.; Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Knox, of Lafayette, La.; Mr. Robert Pettit, of Lafayette, La.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, time does not permit me to list the names of each and every other representative of my State now in Washington. However, as the senior Senator from Louisiana, as chairman of the 1959 Louisiana State Society Mardi Gras ball, it is my personal privilege to extend to these distinguished citizens of my State, greetings, and to assure them that all of us, in the Congress, and all those in private business and Government employment in the Washington area, bid them welcome to the Nation's Capital.

HOUSING ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 57) to extend and amend laws relating to the provision and improvement of housing and the renewal of urban communities, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SPARKMAN. First, I should like to ask how much time I have remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I ask for only 1 minute.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Very well; I yield to my able friend, who is a member of the committee, 1 minute.

Mr. BUSH. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. President, I simply wish to refer to what the majority leader said a few minutes ago. He spoke of an insertion which he intended to make in the RECORD; he said it was in regard to how the 85th Congress cut back by approximately $5 billion the appropriation requests of the administration.

I rise to ask whether those are net reductions of what has been requested by the administration, or whether they are simply cuts. I also ask what additions the Congress itself made. In other words, if the RECORD is to contain insertions to show what were the reductions in expenditures, it should also contain insertions to show what additions in expenditures have been made by the Congress.

I have noticed such a statement by the majority leader before. To me, it is not a complete statement, and does not give the correct impression. So I ask him to state whether the decrease to which he referred in the expenditures voted by the 85th Congress is a net decrease or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield further; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, if the majority leader wishes to have me yield time to him, I now do so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut has concluded his statement, I ask the Senator from Alabama to yield for just a moment to me.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I want Senators to notice what has happened here. The Republicans have used all the time available to them; and now, after all the time available to them has been consumed by them, they request us to yield time to them. We are perfectly willing to yield to them from the time available to us, and we hope they will remember our courtesy.

Mr. President, what the Senator from Connecticut has said reminds me of Bob Taylor's goat, down in Tennessee. The animals held a convention, and wanted to signal their approval of a matter by raising their tails. But the opossum rose and objected; he said he had a very scaly tail which would not look very good if raised in public, whereas, he said, the fox had a beautiful tail which, when raised in public, would be admired by everyone. So the opossum said, "I do not think I would cause pleasure by raising my tail in public. And, besides, Mr. Billy Goat, over there, has done voted." [Laughter.]

Now the Senator from Connecticut has described a letter which he has not seen; he has informed the Senate of the contents of the letter, although he does not know what the letter contains.

I do not wish to detain the Senate further, now that it is about ready to vote on the pending amendment.

The letter is on its way to the Chamber. If I am able to obtain additional time—which I anticipate I shall be able to do later in the afternoon—I shall provide the Senator with a copy of the letter, which comes from the staff of the Appropriations Committee; and I shall furnish him with a tabulation of the votes in which he and all other Members of the Senate participated, and in which I think all of them will take great pride; they are the votes which reflect the total reductions of $5,600 million in Presidential appropriation requests.

I shall also furnish a copy of the President's budget requests this year.

I believe I am correct in repeating now what I repeated at the White House, in a conference of the leadership, earlier in the year, namely, that this administration is asking this Congress for $825 million more in the field of foreign aid than the last Congress gave the administration; and I emphasize the word "more," so that those who wish to do so can judge who the real spenders are.

I furthermore make this prediction. If we continue trying to brand one party as the party of spenders, and the other party as the party of savers; if we continue trying to brand one party as the party of socialism, and the other party as the party of free enterprise; if we continue to deal in labels instead of reason, I think the people may get a balanced budget, all right. There is going to be so much propaganda that by the time we get through the last appropriation bill, Congress may balance it in that last bill.

Mr. President, we have differences of opinion. Some of us want to put a few roofs over people's heads. Some want to build reclamation projects abroad. I have not checked it, but someone told me the other day an Interior official or authority on Interior matters said we spent more on reclamation projects abroad last year than we did on reclamation projects at home.

As the Senator from Louisiana has consistently pointed out—and I have not always agreed with him—this Congress has made substantial reductions in foreign aid and reductions in other items. I remember the cry that went up, when we took away one of these programs that we thought was wasting money, and sought to cut it down.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Illinois knows to whom I refer—Mr. Arthur Larsen. We were willing to give him as much money as his agency had had the previous year——

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, how much time does the Senator have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No. I will yield in a moment, but the Senator would not yield to me. I want to get some information before this body. I refer to the appropriation for the USIA. He did not know what the Administrator was spending it for or where he was spending it. We asked him to ascertain the facts and tell us in 2 or 3 days.

Former Senator Knowland and the Senator from Illinois were members of the committee. I think the Senator from Massachusetts was a member. I think we all agreed that the Agency made a very poor case, and we cut its request. We had a vote on the floor. I think there were 20 votes in favor of the Agency's request.

Mr. President, some Senators are going to want more appropriated for reclamation projects. Some are going to want more for foreign aid. Can we not differ without questioning each other's integrity or labeling one party as the party of spenders and the other party as the party of savers? Let us reason among ourselves and go over requests with a fine-tooth comb.

I want to save every little penny I can save. It does not mean I am a spender because I want to vote for a housing bill and because I voted to restore $800 million for foreign aid last year. I may support foreign aid this year. Our President asked me to try to restore $800 million. I did not go on television and say, "He is a spender. Beware of him." I said, "Mr. President, I have grave doubts about the wisdom of the request, but I am going to resolve the doubts in your favor, because if anyone has had experience in this matter, you have had. I think you have had more experience in this field than I."

My vote was the deciding vote on restoring several hundred million dollars to the appropriation for foreign aid. Last year we got several hundred milllion dollars. We could not get all we wanted. Senator Knowland and I defended the administration against amendments which would have further cut the amount in the bill. Who were the spenders and who were the savers then?

No one has a monopoly on patriotism or thrift. We are all good Americans. We do not want to have one party labeled as the party of spenders, or the party of treason, or the party of Socialists, because the people will not take that kind of stuff. They showed it when they did not permit anyone to run against Eugene Debs. They knew he was gone.

In the last election the majority party did not lose one single seat in this body. For one of the first times in the history of the Republic, the majority party picked up 15 new Senate seats, and a few Republicans won by a hair's breadth.

The Senator from Alabama has handed me an article showing results of a Gallup Poll, which some persons have been quoting quite loosely. The poll shows that in the 1958 election 56 percent of the people voted for the Democrats and 43 percent for the Republicans.

Since then the Republicans have been climbing. The people have been reading some of the Republican speeches.

The Democratic trend today is 58 percent to 42 percent——

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will finish this sentence, and then conclude.

I am going to work as diligently as I can, as leader of the majority, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, to get the budget in balance.

I know two ways to balance the budget. One is to sit in a rocking chair and quit working, to sit and chew and go on retirement and to be paid unemployment compensation benefits and do nothing. The other way is to get up before daylight, work until after dark, do more, and build more, for the country. I am for the latter way.

But I am going to screen these appropriation bills. I do not think we have to be lectured on spending. When this Congress shall have finished its work this year, I predict it will be found that we increased some of the recommendations of the President, and cut some of the recommendations of the President. This is not going to be a "me too" Congress—at least on this side of the Capitol. I hope it will not be on either side.

When it is all over, I hope we shall have a sound fiscal policy and a balanced budget. I think we can have one if we quit assuming that only one party is the patriotic one and the other party is made up of spendthrifts and spenders.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. What is the status of the time remaining to either side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for—I was going to say a moment. I am not going to say one of the majority leader's "moments," which I think was about 15 minutes long, but I shall be content with 5 minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I must object unless this side is granted the same amount of time as the other side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I spoke in the time which was allotted.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I shall object unless the request is modified to give our side the same amount of time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We do not need all that time.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have 8 additional minutes, the minority leader to have 5 minutes and the majority leader to have 3 minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Reserving the right to object, a couple of Senators have asked me for time to speak. I have been unable to give it to them. I insist on being granted the same amount of time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Very well. We shall yield it back.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a point of order. Let us have the unanimous-consent request acted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the request of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I modify my request to provide for 5 minutes on each side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request has been modified to provide for 5 minutes to either side.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, how much time remains?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. There is no time on the amendment.

Mr. President, may we have the request acted upon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the unanimous-consent request proposed by the Senator from Texas. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Chair recognizes the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 30 seconds to the Senator from Indiana. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana is recognized for 30 seconds.

Mr. CAPEHART. In all friendliness, since the majority leader made so much to-do about the fact that he would not yield, I will ask the question: Was the long speech the Senator made not on my time rather than on his own time? [Laughter.]

I am not complaining about that.

I want to say another thing. I think the majority leader has proved conclusively, without a question of doubt, that the Congress of the United States controls appropriations and ought to control them. I hope from this time on we shall control appropriations even more than we have in the past.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I address an observation to the majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am listening.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should like to have the majority leader reinstitute his request now to have printed in the RECORD the letter that he discussed, which was one coming from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the Senator do that on his own time and in his own manner?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Did the Senator from Texas withdraw the request?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I withdrew it. I have 5 minutes which I plan to use discussing that matter and others.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I trust that request will be renewed, and I hope there will be no objection from this side of the aisle, because I want the whole story to be told.

One of the most delightful qualities about the majority leader is——

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, may we have order, so that we can hear the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from Illinois will suspend until the Senate is in order. All persons desiring to confer will retire to the cloakrooms.

The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, one of the most delightful qualities about the majority leader is that he can often persist in error. I think the whole record ought to be made, because I have seen this allegation about how much the majority cut, ostensibly with Republican aid, in the 85th Congress. I am afraid, however, as it has been presented from time to time it does not tell the whole story. What we want to know is: What is the picture with respect to all spending? We will not get that story entirely from the Appropriations Committee.

I observe my distinguished friend, the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], is present in the Chamber. How eloquently he waxed on occasion about bypassing the Appropriations Committee and getting money out of the Federal Treasury by other methods and devices.

In connection with my remarks, Mr. President, I had expected to have printed as a part of my remarks a statement from the Bureau of the Budget, indicating what happened with respect to all spending, with respect to all of the President's requests, to show the ultimate result after the vetoes and Republican opposition had a chance to be registered. However, I do not have the statement at hand now, and shall have it inserted at some future time.

Then we shall see whether there was a cut or whether there was an increase. Then we shall determine also whether this applied to 2 years instead of 1. I am willing to stand on the record any time.

I think sometimes of the fellow who saw an automobile accident out home, when he was put on the stand to testify. Counsel said, "Did you see the accident?" He said, "Yes, sir." Counsel asked, "How far were you away when the accident happened?" He said, "Twenty-two feet nine and three-quarter inches." Counsel looked at the court and looked at the jury and said, "Well, Smartie, tell the court and jury, how do you know it was twenty-two feet nine and three-quarter inches?" He said, "When it happened, I took out a tape measure and measured from where I stood to the point of impact, because I knew some lawyer was going to ask me that question."

The question has been asked, and we are going to get all the facts, including the facts with respect to bypassing of the Appropriations Committee. When that matter is resolved I think it will set up an entirely different story. I am willing to let the Government record speak eloquently in cold figures on that point.

I have nothing more to say, Mr. President.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not want a partial record to be made; I want the full record to be made.

Mr. President, I asked permission to have the letter printed in the RECORD a few moments ago. Under a reservation of objection, I withdrew my request. I want to now read the letter into the RECORD.

The letter is dated October 2, 1958. The letter is addressed to Hon. LYNDON B. JOHNSON, Democratic leader, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C., and is signed by Everard Smith, clerk, Senate Appropriations Committee.

I believe the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] has probably confirmed this in the last few moments, perhaps with the Committee on Appropriations. If I am in error I hope the Senator will say so. Anyway, the letter reads as follows:

DEAR SENATOR JOHNSON: The two tables attached, appearing in the Daily Digest of September 12, 1958, represent the total appropriations—

That is what we are requested to make. We do not make expenditures; we make appropriations; and the administrative officials accumulate them and accumulate them, carry them over and carry them over, and accumulate them and accumulate them. They are asking for appropriations.

I read further from the letter—represent the total appropriations made during the first and second sessions of the 85th Congress.

It will be noted that the total estimates—

That is, budget estimates—

considered during the 1st session of the 85th Congress—

That is, every kind of estimate which is submitted—amounted to $64,638,110,610.

That is what was requested, roughly $64.6 billion. I hope Senators will keep that in mind. That is the request that came to us.

Senators can run themselves down if they wish to. Senators can brand themselves as spenders if they wish to, but I am going to defend them, because Senators voted to reduce those requests from $64 billion to $59,589,731,631, a reduction—capitalize—emphasize—a reduction in the budget estimates by the Congress—

Not by the Democrats but all the Congress, although the Democrats were in control of the Congress—

of $5,058,378,979—

In the first session.

The former Senator from California, Mr. Knowland, and I had an agreement that we would call the roll to see if any Senator wanted to reduce or wanted to add. We wanted to reduce these requests. We did that.

I believe I am correct, though I am speaking from memory, when I say we called the roll on every appropriation bill and in each instance it was either unanimous or there were less than five votes against us.

I read further from the letter:

The total estimates considered during the 2d session of the 85th Congress amounted to $73,272,659,573 and the appropriations to $72,653,476,248, or a reduction in the budget estimates by the Congress—

All of us—

of $619,183,325.

The figures in the tables are exclusive of permanent appropriations estimated at $8,346 million for the fiscal year 1958 and $8,334 million for the fiscal year 1959.

Sincerely yours,

EVERARD SMITH,
Clerk, Senate Appropriations Committee.

Those last two figures include automatic expenditures, such as interest on the public debt and the return of taxes and matters like that, largely handled in the Treasury Department.

Mr. President, I want to make a final point. I do not claim that is a record made by the Democrats. I claim that is a record made by this institution of which I am so proud, the Senate of the United States.

I simply ask people to reserve judgment on what we are going to do this year. Before we are branded as spenders, give us a chance. I ask people to reserve comment, because I am afraid they are going to oversell some of their people to the point where they will have to come back to ask us to restore some of the cuts which may be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Texas has expired.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Senate will give me more time I will yield. My time has expired.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Senator referred to me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have no more time.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be granted 1 additional minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The figures were given to me, as the Senator said. They are substantially the figures given by the Senator from Texas. I should like to add one point, in the interest of accuracy. I know the Senator wants to be absolutely accurate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is the letter accurate, as I read it?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I do not have the letter. There is just one additional amount. As I understand, those figures do not include, when we consider all Federal expenditures, programs financed by borrowing authority.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct. I stated that, and pointed it out, and referred to interest on the public debt and other matters.

What I wish to point out in the 30 seconds I may have left is that the Congress—all of us—ought to be proud of our record. We reduced the President's request by $5,600,000,000, notwithstanding the fact that we gave him $1 billion more than he asked for defense. We may not be able to do that well this year; but give us a chance. By custom, appropriation bills originate in the other body.

I understand, from reading the newspapers, that some of the items will be trimmed pretty effectively. Some of my friends may be put in an embarrassing position and we may be asked to restore some of this money before we are through. So I ask them not to be too much occupied with putting labels on us. There are prudent Members on both sides of the aisle; and we are going to save every dime we can, consistent with good national policy.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President——

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. DIRKSEN. First I must find out how much time I have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I ask unanimous consent to add 1 minute, so as to equalize the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yielded time to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Very well. I ask that the majority leader be granted an additional minute. I have 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he be recognized for 2 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No. I have 1 minute in my own right. I ask for an additional minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator is granted an additional minute.

Mr. DIRKSEN. According to the clock, I now have 120 seconds. I yield 60 seconds to the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE].

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I do not think I shall require 60 seconds.

The total figures given by the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] are substantially correct, in comparison with the recapitulation of estimates and appropriations for the 1st and 2d sessions of the 85th Congress. I have the tables before me. I think the tables as a whole would be of interest to the Senate. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the two tables shown in the compilation of appropriations for the 1st and 2d sessions of the 85th Congress be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I have no objection to the insertion of the tables in the RECORD. The Senator from South Dakota says that the letter from the clerk of the Appropriations Committee is substantially correct. Does that mean it is correct, or is there an error?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. There is a little variation from the figures shown in the tables.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Which is correct—the Senator's tables or the clerk of the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I think the tables are undoubtedly correct. They are contained in bound volumes——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The mere fact that they are bound does not make them any more correct.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. No; but the figures are shown in detail, bill by bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the Senator question the totals as given by the staff of the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The reason I should like to have the itemization made a part of the RECORD is that it would make clear just where the increases and reductions were made.

Much was made during the 85th Congress, and much is made in this Congress, of the defense picture.

Of the $5 billion by which the first session of the 85th Congress reduced the President's requests, $2,368 million represented a reduction in the request of the President for the Department of Defense. The country has heard much about the failure of the Eisenhower administration to provide adequately for defense.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wish to make it clear, and I defy any Senator to deny it—that the President did not use all the appropriations we made for defense. Some of the money is impounded. Let us not try to pull the wool over the eyes of intelligent people. I do not pass judgment on the President's decision to impound certain funds and refusing to spend them; but that is a fact, and no Senator can deny it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, what about my unanimous-consent request, which I made in my own time, to have placed in the RECORD certain tables prepared under the direction of the Committee on Appropriations, as required by law?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the tables may be printed in the RECORD.

The tables are as follows:

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. As I understood the request of the Senator from Illinois, as modified, it was that each side have an additional minute. The Senator from Texas has not used his minute. He was speaking a moment ago on a reservation of objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] asked for 1 additional minute, which request was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask the Senator from Illinois if he did not modify his request so as to request 1 minute additional for each side.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I did; and nothing happened to it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The request was put.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct; and I reserved the right to object, and spoke on the subject of the tables submitted by the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Illinois to be for 2 additional minutes. The Senator from Illinois stated that he had 1 minute remaining, and that he desired only 1 additional minute. The Chair put the request, which was agreed to. The Senator has 1 minute remaining. The Senate gave consent to grant an additional minute. The Senator used the additional minute which the Senate granted.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I think the Chair is in error. First of all, I yielded 1 minute to the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE].

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have 1 minute left. I ask unanimous consent that the majority leader may have an additional minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I understand I have 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has 1 minute.

Mr. DIRKSEN. A very distinguished member of another legislative body—and I must be careful not to transgress the rules—referred to the 1960 budget as a spenders' budget. He is a member of the Democratic Party.

A very distinguished legislator of another body—and incidentally, he comes from the greatest unfrozen State in the Union, the great State of Texas—stated that the GOP budget is a "booby trap." I believe our distinguished majority leader referred to it as a propaganda budget. Adjectives are not going to change it.

I stand on the observations I made. We want to see what the whole picture is, not merely what comes in the form of a letter from the Appropriations Committee. I will stand on that observation too, any time, anywhere.

I did not hear whether my request was granted to include in my remarks certain figures to be obtained from the Budget Bureau with respect to the whole picture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thank the Chair.

I now yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, with respect to the table which the Senator requested to have printed in the RECORD, has that request been acted upon? I assume it has.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The assumption is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I shall take 10 seconds to say that I know of nothing I can do to control expenditures except to reduce appropriations. The President determines what is to be spent and what is to be impounded. However, we did reduce appropriations, and that is a record of which all of us should be proud.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mark Twain once said, in a New Year's resolution, "I am going to live within my income this year, even if I have to borrow money to do it." [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Has all time been used on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. May the amendment be stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 305 and insert the following:

SEC. 305. (a) Section 103(a) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by striking out the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The aggregate of capital grants with respect to all the projects of a local public agency on which contracts for capital grants have been made under this title shall not exceed the total amount obtained by adding together the amounts for each such project determined by multiplying its net project cost by the applicable percentage. Such percentage, which shall apply to each project receiving initial Federal recognition during the period specified, shall be 66⅔ per centum for the period prior to July 1, 1960; 60 per centum for the period between July 1, 1960, and June 30, 1961, inclusive; 55 per centum for the period between July 1, 1961, and June 30, 1962, inclusive; and 50 per centum for any time thereafter: Provided, That the percentage for any project for which no planning advance or grant is received and retained by the local public agency and which the Administrator, at the request of such agency, may approve on a three-fourths capital grant basis shall be 75 per centum, or such lesser percentage as the Administrator determines to be generally consistent with the percentage of net project costs hereunder applicable at the time to projects not so approved."

(b) The first sentence of section 103(b) of such Act is amended by striking out all before the proviso and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The Administrator, on and after July 1, 1949, may, with the approval of the President, contract to make capital grants with respect to projects assisted under this title aggregating not to exceed $1,650 million, which limit shall be increased by $250 million on July 1 in each of the years 1959, 1960, 1961, 1962, 1963, and 1964:".

(c) Section 104 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 104. Every contract for capital grants under this title shall require local grants-in-aid in connection with the projects involved which, together with the local grants-in-aid to be provided in connection with all other projects of the local public agency on which contracts for capital grants have theretofore been made, will be at least equal to the difference between the aggregate net project costs involved and the sum described in the second sentence of section 103(a)."

(d) The proviso in the first sentence of section 110(e) of such Act is hereby amended by striking out "second sentence" and inserting in lieu thereof "third sentence".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time for debate has expired. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

On this vote, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is paired with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER]. If present and voting, the Senator from Nevada would vote "nay," and the Senator from Arizona would vote "yea."

On this vote, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. If present and voting, the Senator from Oregon would vote "nay," and the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "yea."

Mr. DIRKSEN. I announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is absent in the State to attend the funeral of a friend.

The Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] are detained on official business.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER]. If present and voting, the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "yea" and the Senator from Oregon would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE]. If present and voting, the Senator from Arizona would vote "yea," and the Senator from Nevada would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 58, as follows:

NOT VOTING—8

Beall	Goldwater	Murray
Bible	Kuchel	Neuberger
Bridges	Martin

So Mr. CAPEHART'S amendment, as modified, was rejected.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the amendment was rejected be reconsidered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] has at the desk an amendment, which has been printed several days, which would strike from the bill the $125 million guarantee of college housing funds. The bill also contains an authorization for $400 million for college housing.

I send to the desk an amendment which would reduce the $400 million to $300 million and would eliminate the $125 million guarantee fund. The amendment is intended to be proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and myself.

I ask that the amendment not be read, but that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be printed.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 130, line 19, strike out "$1,325,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,225,000,000".

On page 130, line 21, strike out "$150,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$137,500,000".

On page 130, line 24, strike out "$75,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$62,500,000".

Strike out the matter that appears beginning on line 9, page 132, through line 10, page 135.

On page 137, strike out lines 7 and 8.

On page 137, line 9, strike out "(9)" and insert in lieu thereof "(8)".

On page 138, line 6, after the semicolon, insert "and".

On page 138, line 7, strike out "(10)" and insert in lieu thereof "(9)".

On page 138, strike out lines 10 through 13.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the amendment strikes from the bill the $125 million college guarantee fund, as the Morse amendment does, and reduces the college housing fund from $400 million to $300 million.

It is proposed to discuss the amendment in detail later.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Ohio, who has waited a long time this morning, be recognized for 5 minutes to address the Senate on a very important matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DESTRUCTION OF AMERICAN TRANSPORT PLANE IN SOVIET RUSSIA

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, at 1 o'clock p.m. today, the State Department issued a release throwing some light upon the circumstances which attended the finding of an American transport plane on the territory of Soviet Russia. Seventeen American boys were in that plane, which was destroyed on Russian territory last September 2.

Inquiry was made about the circumstances which brought that plane down. No satisfactory answer was given by the Soviet Government.

Six bodies were alleged to have been found. Those six bodies were turned over to the U.S. Government. The other 11 have remained unaccounted for.

Our State Department alleged that the plane had been shot down. The Soviet Government denied the allegation. About 2 weeks ago, Mikoyan attended a luncheon sponsored by the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was a courtesy luncheon. I asked Mikoyan at that meeting to explain the mystery surrounding the situation and to describe what had happened on the part of the Soviets. I asked Mikoyan where the other 11 men were.

Mikoyan said, "There is no mystery. Your plane was found upon our territory. There were six boys in it. And we turned those boys over."

I said to him, "Where are the other 11?"

His answer to me was, "You have no faith in us."

I then said to him, "It is not a matter of faith."

He answered, "Hereafter, if your Government will tell us when your planes will be over our territory, how many persons are in the planes, and what the mission is, such a thing will not happen."

I was jarred by what he said, jarred to the point where I did not think quickly enough to ask another question. I should have asked him, "What relationship was there between the finding of the missing plane on your territory and our failure to tell you that the plane would be over Soviet territory?"

That was the end of that conversation.

Mr. President, some very shocking information has been disclosed today. Our Government asked the Ambassador of the Soviets to listen to a transcribed tape showing the conversations between the Russian pilots who were chasing the American plane, and who finally shot it down. The Russian Ambassador said he would not want to interpret the recording on the tape.

Well, that recording is now available, and I shall read some of what it says. Two Russian planes were in the air, and the two Russian pilots were talking to each other. I shall read now a translation of part of the transcript of the tape-recorded radio conversation between those Soviet fighter pilots who participated in the attack on our C–130 plane on September 2, 1958:

I am at maximum speed
Roger.
What is yours?
Three thousand.
I read you excellently.
Five hundred and eighty-three, I read excellently.
I read 18 excellently.
Understood altitude 100.
Understood.
In the northwest, about seven balls here.
Very poor, almost none.

Then the talk goes on.

Finally there is the following:

I am climbing, I am 201, I am climbing.
Roger.
Roger * * * 582.
I am looking.
To the south there is, 2–3 balls.
Five hundred and eighty-two, I see the target, to the right.
I see the target, a large one.
Its altitude is 100, as you said.
I am 201, I see the target, attack!
I am 201, I am attacking the target.
You are understood.
I am attacking the target.
Stand by.
The target is a large one.
Roger.
Attack, attack, 218 attack.
Stand by.
Five hundred and eighty-two * * *
The target is a transport, four-engined.
Roger.
Roger.
Two hundred and one, I am attacking the target.
Target speed is 300. I am going along with it. It is turning toward the fence.
The target is burning.
There's a hit.
The target is burning, 582.
The target is banking.
It is going toward the fence.
Open fire.
Two hundred and eighteen, are you attacking?
Yes, yes.
The target is burning.
The tail assembly is falling off the target.
Eighty-two, do you see me? I am in front of the target.
Look.
Oh?
Look at him, he will not get away, he is already falling.
Yes, he is falling; I will finish him off, boys, I will finish him off on the run.
The target has lost control, it is going down.
Now the target will fall * * *
Eighty-two, a little to the right.
The target has turned over * * *
The target is falling * * *
Eighty-two. I see, I am watching the target, I see.
Aha, you see, it is falling.
Yes * * * form up, go home.
After my third pass, the target started burning.

Mr. President, when it is argued, "Take the word of the Soviets and believe that they are moving in a conciliatory way toward the achievement of peace," I say to my colleagues, "Be a bit doubtful about it."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENNEDY in the chair). The time yielded to the Senator from Ohio has expired.

HOUSING ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 57) to extend and amend laws relating to the provision and improvement of housing and the renewal of urban communities, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the distinguished minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN] be added to the amendment at the desk, as a cosponsor; it is the amendment which reduces by a total of $225 billion the amount of the bill. I also ask unanimous consent that the name of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], who yesterday and last evening urged this course upon us, also be included as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a statement by the author of the $125 million amendment, the guaranteed housing amendment, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], which he prepared in support of his amendment, which is included in the pending amendment.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MORSE

Mr. President, last night I introduced an amendment, No. 2-4-59—B. The amendment strikes from the committee bill the section guaranteeing loans from private lenders for academic facilities.

I am proud to have been a cosponsor of S. 3713 introduced in the 85th Congress by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] authorizing direct loans to educational institutions for academic facilities, as well as housing. It will be recalled that, due largely to the energetic work of the Senator from Pennsylvania, much of that bill was incorporated into the housing bill passed by the Senate late in the last session. I was very pleased at the time that the Senate took that action.

Now, in the pending bill, part of the loan funds for that program are again included. The Administrator of the Housing Act of 1950 is authorized in the bill to make direct loans to educational institutions for the construction of new, or the rehabilitation of existing, classrooms, laboratories, and related academic facilities. One hundred and twenty-five million dollars is made available for these direct loans; the rate of interest is the same as that for college housing loans, which is currently 2⅞ percent.

Let me say that in my opinion the only improvements that might be made on that provision would be to make the funds available as grants, rather than loans and increase the amount. But lending money at low interest rates to our institutions of higher education for badly needed classroom facilities is the next best thing. It is an excellent investment.

Our experience with the college housing loan program has been so successful that Congress should have no hesitation in expanding it to other facilities. I know the institutions are somewhat reluctant to press a loan program for classrooms and libraries because they have no revenue from such facilities to pledge against the loan, as they do in the case of dormitories.

But I do not have any fears on that count. Our colleges and universities pay thir debts. The Government has gotten back its money from the college housing program. The statement was made in the hearings that there has not been a single default in the housing loan program.

I know of no reason to doubt that this superb record would also extend to loans for other academic construction.

Having expressed my support for expanding the direct loan program to include academic facilities, let me now turn to the guarantee section.

The administration has responded to the urgent need for classrooms in our colleges and universities in typical fashion; it has said: "Go to lending institutions and pay the rate of interest they fix, and the Government will guarantee the loan."

I submit that reply is only an evasion; it does nothing at all to help the institutions. Their records are such that if they can find a private lender at all, they will repay the loan. The interest rate will be higher, of course, and private loan money for classroom facilities may be hard to find, but if they are able to swing such a loan, the Federal guarantee won't mean a thing. It appears to me that the administration is offering a form and no substance, and I see no reason to retain it in the bill.

I call the attention of my colleagues to the statement of Hurst R. Anderson, president of American University. Dr. Anderson appeared on behalf of the American Council on Education which represents 139 educational organizations and 1,032 institutions. Dr. Anderson states that his presentation also has the approval of the American Association of Land-Grant Colleges and State Universities, the Association of American Colleges, and the Association for Higher Education of the National Education Association.

He says on page 474 of the printed hearings:

"The proposed $100 million authorization to guarantee the taxable obligations of private institutions is merely an idle gesture. Since there has never been a default by a college or university on a housing loan from any source in the entire history of American higher education, a Federal guarantee is known to be unnecessary, and would have, so far as we can determine, no effect toward lowering the interest charged by private lenders.

"The only justification for this authorization is that it would tend to reduce the risk, and since there isn't any real risk, we cannot see how it could be reduced by the authorization of this $100 million item."

Although the amount now in the bill differs somewhat from the figure upon which Dr. Anderson was testifying, his conclusions are still applicable.

I say to those in the administration whose concern for the budget is solely for its total cost and not for its value, here is a way to cut $125 million from the total authorization in this housing bill. It is only a paper reduction, of course, but it was only a paper increase, too. The provision would not help the institutions; it does not make money available to them. It only lists a figure of $125 million in private loans it will guarantee; it is not $125 million which the taxpayers would be putting up. There is nothing in the hearings in support of it; it is only mentioned as being an idle gesture by the very people affected by it.

Let us rid this bill of figures that are only used by the administration to support its cry of excessive spending on the part of the Democratic Congress. We have heard a lot here about the need for economy and cutting down the total of this housing bill. So let us stick to meaningful provisions. The housing needs of the American people, and the financial needs of our educational facilities are serious, and deserve to be met with legislation that will help alleviate them. The section I seek to strike from the bill does not meet that test. It only serves to inflate the total. Therefore, I move the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I understand there is no desire to have the yeas and nays taken on the question of agreeing to this amendment; and I understand that the amendment is acceptable.

If we can now vote on the amendment, we then can call up another amendment; and then some of us can go to lunch.

Mr. LONG. I did not hear the request.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have asked that we be allowed to vote on the amendment which calls for a reduction to the extent of a total of $225 million, and then we can call up another amendment.

Mr. LONG. The distinguished Senator is not proposing that some of us be prevented from speaking on the amendment, is he?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Oh, no.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, some time is still available to this side; and before the vote is taken, I yield myself 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, no request has been made for a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment.

At this time I wish to make my own position clear: This amendment goes in the proper direction, but in my judgment it does not go far enough.

However, when one is offered half a loaf, although he is looking for a full loaf, obviously he will not turn down half a loaf of bread. Nevertheless, the amendment will not make any change in my determination to vote against the bill basically, as it now stands.

I do commend the majority leader for undertaking to improve the bill. It has been improved very materially by the amendment adopted on yesterday—I refer to the amendment on direct loans; and it is about to be improved further by the pending amendment. But I still insist that it does not go far enough.

So, Mr. President, although I am glad to cosponsor the amendment because it is beneficial up to a limited point, I still reserve the right to vote against the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, in order that the record may be clear regarding the impact of this housing bill, as amended by the committee, and as amended by the Senate, I call attention to the administration's estimate of budget expenditures for the fiscal year 1960, under Senate bill 57, as amended, and under the administration's proposal. These figures show that

Senate bill 57 will call for expenditures amounting to $135,700,000 more than the administration's proposals. One hundred million of this increase is for direct home loans to veterans in small towns and rural areas. That money may not be used. So I wish to make this point: If the bill in its present form is passed, following adoption of the amendment which now is at the desk, the bill will contain, for next year's budget, $135 million more authorizations than those contained in the administration's bill. Of those $135 million, $100 million is for direct loans to veterans, which the administration says they will not need, anyway, because the higher interest rate will make it unnecessary. If that contention is correct, and if we do not need to use the $100 million, then there will be a difference of $35 million between the two.

Mr. President, when we can get the spenders and the savers that close together, with a difference of only $35 million between their positions, in the case of one of the most important domestic measures the Congress ever will handle, I think we have done a reasonably good job.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. My figures show a difference of $140 million; but I shall not argue about that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is $140,300,000, under Senate bill 57; and the administration has $4,600,000 to be subtracted from it; and that leaves $135,700,000.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the official figures printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Budget expenditures for 1960 fiscal year (after college housing and direct-loan amendments)

[In millions]

	Administration	S. 57
Grants:
Urban renewal grants
Public housing
Relocation payments		3.2
Urban planning (701)	1.0	1.1
Scholarships grants		.5
Defense hospital grants		2.5
Loans:
Urban renewal planning	3.6	7.0
Public housing planning		21.0
College housing:
Dormitories
Classrooms		5.0
VA direct loans		100.0
Total	4.6	140.3

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I wish to substantiate what the able majority leader has just now stated: If the bill, as it has been amended up to this point, is passed, and if no further additions are made to it, and if the $150 million is loaned to veterans, the difference between what the Senate will have passed and what the administration originally requested will be $135 million. If the $150 million is not used in direct loans, and it may not be used, and let us hope it will not be necessary to use it, it would make a difference of only $35 million to $40 million.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the $150 million is not used, the difference would be $35.7 million.

Mr. CAPEHART. In all fairness I think we ought to say that for the benefit of the President, the benefit of the press, and the benefit of the record.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We cannot arrive at a difference to the dollar between the proposals of each other, when we take a bill of this scope and magnitude and consider it thoroughly, as the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. SPARKMAN] and as the ranking minority member [Mr. CAPEHART] and as the chairman of the full committee [Mr. FULBRIGHT] did, and bring the bill to the floor and adopt amendments, as we have, in a give-and-take attitude, an attitude of reasonableness and of meeting each other halfway.

Many times I have resolved my doubts in favor of the administration that resulted in considerably more expense than $35 million. We may have to do it later on in the year.

I hope the amendment will be adopted, as the Senator from Indiana has so well said—and I think he has said many things well. We have found ourselves so much in agreement that I hope we can pass the bill before disagreement develops. But if the bill is passed we shall have a bill which, in the language of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], is substantially the same as the administration's recommendations.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think we are dealing with assumptions when we make money available and then say it will not be spent. Secondly, there is no emphasis on the fact that the bill goes beyond 1960——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am not making that assumption. I think we need direct loans for veterans. I am not going to vote against veterans in the rural areas. I think, however, that the administration has contended—and I ask the chairman of the subcommittee to correct me if I am not correct—that with the increase in interest rates provided, it will not be necessary to use the money. That is the administration's and our President's contention. Is that correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That was the argument against the $150 million.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am not going to assume that will happen. I think there has to be a fund available to show that if veterans are made to pay through the nose, the Government will lend them the money. The administration assumes it will not be necessary to use the money. It is the assumption of the administration of the Senator from Illinois, not ours. If the assumption is correct, there will be a difference of only $35 million.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is not the whole story, if the majority will allow me to proceed. I still contend it is an assumption, because what has been sought has been an opportunity to make the processing and procedural facilities available so the loans can be handled virtually on an FHA basis, and so the credit can go into remote and inaccessible areas.

Secondly, there has been no emphasis of the fact that this program will continue for a course of years. We are authorizing money for future years. That becomes a consideration for the administration.

Finally, it is said we get together within $35 or $40 million——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. For next year. I want to make it abundantly clear that I am talking about the next year's budget. I grant that over the years much more is involved. I do not want to mislead the Senator.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; but $35 million is $35 million; and $40 million is $40 million. Even though we have gotten into the habit of dealing with billions, it is still a lot of money, which has to come from the taxpayer. It still constitutes a hole in the budget, which was submitted in the hope that its main lines could be observed, so when the record was finally closed there would be a balanced budget.

I close on this one note. I think sometimes of the story of the young lady who said to a very attractive young man, "I will marry you if you save $1,000." But all her associates were getting married, and she was getting eager. One day she said, "How much did you save?" He said, "$35." She said, "That's enough." [Laughter.]

What is provided may be enough, but in my book it is not enough. While others may disagree, that represents my viewpoint. I must assume my statement is correct, because I think it is consonant with the administration's viewpoint.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I commend the Senator from Indiana for his contributions. I make no prediction about what the outcome will be as to action on the pending bill, but I remind the Senator from Indiana of the somewhat inconsistent positions in which some persons may find themselves. The administration wanted to take the lid off FHA. It wanted the sky to be the limit. The administration said, "Let us have no limit."

We have retained the ceiling on FHA. We have said that Congress must act again when the Government has used up the present authority. We have said authorizations must be obtained from Congress.

Some have been talking about getting every pound of flesh. The administration wanted to take the ceiling off so there would be no limitation. I want the record to show that. So far as I am concerned, I am going to take the responsibility to provide moneys for veterans' housing if moneylenders will not lend veterans money in this era of high interest rates, when municipal bonds which are tax exempt are selling so they give a return of 4 percent, which gives some people the equivalent of 10, or 12, or 15 percent return; when almost one-tenth of our budget goes to the moneylenders as interest on the debt. I want to point out that the request for FHA which came from this administration had no limit at all—the sky was the limit on FHA.

If it is irresponsibility to provide these funds when we are going to put above our door a welcome sign to the moneylender to lend money to provide a roof over the heads of the veterans who carried Old Glory to the four corners of the globe and brought it back without a stain; and when we are going to let the moneylenders charge 5¼ percent interest, in an effort to induce them to provide roofs over the heads of the men who fought for the moneylenders; then there is a simple answer—if the moneylenders lend them the money, we will not touch these funds.

The administration says it is sure they will lend them the money. I do not know that the administration can speak for the moneylenders. If the money is not loaned, it will not be used. If it is not, I am willing to take the responsibility for saying, "We are going to take some money and lend it to veterans in rural areas where they have a difficult housing problem."

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. I want to get the record straight.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I hope the record is straight, and if not, that the Senator will correct it.

Mr. CAPEHART. The majority leader said the lid was being taken off. I am sure he meant that applies only to FHA regular mortgages on homes where the Government——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the record not show that I said that?

Mr. CAPEHART. I am not sure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will stand on the record. I think I said it.

Mr. CAPEHART. It was on insured mortgages, where a fee of one-half of 1 percent is paid, and the FHA now has a reserve fund of about $800 million.

Those are the kinds of mortgages, of course, which will never cost the U.S. Treasury a nickel unless the people default upon them. If there is a default, the property is taken over for resale. Up to this time, I think the record shows the Government has made money on that operation. And I know that is exactly what the able Senator believes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think it has. It is a good program. However, this is a contingent liability. We prudent fellows have to keep in mind all contingent liabilities. If we should have a depression, and if things should go into a tailspin, we could wind up with a headache. But that has not been true yet. I think this is a good program.

I still want the record to show that it was the Congress which insisted on a limitation and a recheck by other Congresses when this amount is used up, and this administration said, "the sky is the limit so far as the FHA is concerned." I want the people of the country to understand that.

I hope we can act on this amendment and can reduce this amount. I believe the Senator from Indiana has publicly stated he does not think the fund for direct loans to veterans will have to be used if we raise the interest rate.

Mr. CAPEHART. I do not think it will be used, because we do have some money in that fund. It is a revolving fund.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We think it might be used, if we put it there. That is the difference. If the Senator from Indiana is prophetic, as he could be, then there would be only a $35 million difference.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a very brief observation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my delightful friend from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The majority leader is correct. The Senator did emphasize the fact that he was talking about FHA loans. To make it abundantly clear to the 38,000 people who receive the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that is private money. With respect to private money one talks about interest rates in order to coax the money out.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Private money.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Guaranteed by Uncle Sam.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That does make a difference.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is private money, Mr. President. When one talks about interest rates it makes me think about the very eloquent observations made by the majority leader when the session started, when he talked about this dynamic country. Money is dynamic. It is the accumulation of thrift. That is the way one gets capital. Money becomes a commodity in the market and it keeps abreast of whatever the economy calls for.

If one talks about putting on ceilings, then one reverts to a static economy. Whether there is a lid on it or not does not make much difference so long as the money is poured into useful and constructive channels.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the Senator realize we have been forced to put a lid on interest rates?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Definitely so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Surely. Mr. President, we are approaching that ceiling, I will say. Some of our Government securities are selling at pretty high prices now.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The veterans' rates are 4¾ percent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am talking about borrowing. The Secretary of the Treasury is limited to 4¼ percent, and we are now just about to the limit. Some securities are bringing about 4 percent.

I caution our friends that in this day of high interest rates we already are at 4 percent, and the lid is on at 4¼ percent. I do not know whether we are going to have that lid lifted very easily.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield further?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I remember vividly the discussion on this floor last year when the ceilings on interest rates were contrived and contemplated on the floor. The walls of Rome almost shook and fell with the oratory in the Senate Chamber, but the Democrat Party is presenting the increase in interest rates. The walls of Rome have not fallen yet. The housing starts reached a yearly rate of 1.4 million.

I do not think there is need to prolong the discussion further. I think the administration's record is quite good on this point.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I thank my able friend from Illinois for his contribution.

I now yield to the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, who is responsible for the construction of more houses than any man in this Chamber I know of. I commend the Senator for the valiant efforts he has made through the years to bring housing to all the people.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I appreciate the majority leader's yielding to me, and I also appreciate his kind remarks.

Mr. President, I am hopeful the Senator from Illinois, who just stepped out of the Chamber, will return.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, may we have a vote on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas on behalf of himself and other Senators.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I thank my friend.

Mr. SPARKMAN and Mr. CLARK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I asked the distinguished minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] to come back to the Chamber for just a moment, and I shall not detain him long.

On Wednesday there was a brief colloquy between the distinguished Senator from Illinois and me with reference to the revolving fund of the veterans' direct loan program. The Senator at that time said he wished that I would document the case. I will do that by referring to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for April 9, 1951. At that time there was under discussion the proposition of extending the direct loan program which had been written into the law the year before. We included in the program for the first time the revolving principle. The Senator from Illinois at that time said:

I think the amendment establishes a good principle which will be useful in other days.

Some years ago I introduced a bill—and I trust I shall find time to reintroduce it—to compel nearly every lending agency of the Government to make the paper it holds available to anyone who wishes to buy it if he will buy it on terms of par, meaning the unpaid balance plus the accrued interest. Had we had that kind of provision years ago, the Rural Electrification Administration, the Farm Security Administration, and the RFC could have sold whatever paper they had and could have accumulated a revolving fund. Thus, not so much lending power by way of appropriations out of the Federal Treasury would have had to be provided.

If there are servicing institutions that are willing to buy such paper at par, it should be offered for sale at stated periods.

So, Mr. President, I subscribe to the general principle which has been announced here, and I hope we can carry it through.

That is the program which set this up on a revolving basis, and which has continued on through the years and will continue on through other years. I remember quite well I welcomed the endorsement of the program at that time by the Senator from Illinois. I remembered it quite clearly when I referred to it on Wednesday. I am glad to recall it to the Senator's recollection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Does the Senator from Alabama have the floor?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. I wish to make a few more remarks.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I can readily appreciate that sometimes the RECORD can rise to haunt one, but I am afraid that the RECORD which my good friend cites today deals with an entirely different matter.

I have a vivid recollection of a proposal which I introduced in the House to compel every Government agency to sell the mortgages in its portfolio. In those early days that included the Home Owners Loan Corporation, the Farmers Home Administration, and other agencies. The object was to compel the agencies to sell the mortgages in their portfolios in order that private buyers who wanted to buy them could do so, and bail the Government out of its indebted position.

That is quite a different thing from what is involved at the present time with respect to direct loans, only because the facilities heretofore were not available. Now it is proposed to continue down the road and make the Treasury a bank for direct lending. That is quite a different thing.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If I may refresh the Senator's recollection, this is what I said on Wednesday:

I wish to remind the distinguished Senator from Illinois that when this question came up for extension—I believe it was in 1952 or 1953, but I do not remember just when the Senator from Illinois came to the Senate, and perhaps he will enlighten me on that point; but it was the first extension after that time—the Senate incorporated the revolving-fund provision with the annual contribution method provision; and I remember quite well that the Senator from Illinois took the floor and had some good words to say about the program and about this revolving feature. He was most helpful in getting that extension through in the form in which it has operated.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, just let the Senator from Alabama document the RECORD, instead of guessing.

My only purpose is not to criticize the Senator from Illinois, but to do what he asked me to do, namely, document the record. I remembered the record quite clearly. I certainly am not critical of what the Senator said then, or what he says now with reference to the revolving fund.

The revolving fund for the VA direct loan program was established in 1951. The program has come down through the years under the revolving fund, with the automatic appropriation which comes to it each year. The direct loan program is a good program.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I believe the distinguished Senator from Alabama got hold of the wrong record, because it has no bearing on the point before us.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I wish the Senator from Illinois would read what I said on Wednesday when I referred to the fact that he approved the revolving fund. The Senator from Illinois told me to document the record. Here is the record. On April 9, 1951, the amendment which was under consideration was the revolving fund, and the extension of the program, which the Senator from Illinois approved.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The point at issue in the remarks of the Senator from Illinois 8 years ago was in connection with an entirely different subject.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The direct loan program which the Senator is criticizing is still operating under the revolving fund, which the Senator from Illinois approved back in 1951. I repeat, it is a good program.

Mr. President, I should like to say one word with reference to the amendment on college housing on which action was just taken, because I think it is important for us to keep certain things in mind.

The reduction in the college housing provision is from $400 million to $300 million. It has been indicated that that leaves us still in excess of the administration's proposal.

Mr. President, we do not know whether it does or not, because it happens to be one of the programs with respect to which the administration has not yet given us its full proposal. The administration proposes, for the remainder of the fiscal year 1959, $200 milion, and proposes to come forward later with an additional request. We do not know whether that request will be $200 million more, the same as was proposed in 1959, or what it may be.

With respect to the $125 million loan guarantee program, that was not my proposal. It came from the administration. The program was proposed by the administration last year. It is true that the administration did suggest the program this year, mainly because the agency has not brought forward its entire college housing program for this year. But that was the recommendation which was made to us last year. I do not remember what the figure was. I am inclined to think the administration proposed an appropriation of $250 million. Our committee cut that figure in half, and recommended $125 million. Now, on the floor of the Senate, we have eliminated the $125 million. I think it is well to keep the record clear as to where the various proposals come from, and what they amount to in dollar amounts.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 156, between lines 11 and 12, it is proposed to insert a new subsection, as follows:

(d) Section 406(c) of the Housing Act of 1956 is amended by striking out "3 years" in the first proviso and inserting in lieu thereof "5 years."

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I understand that this amendment is acceptable to the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee. I believe it is noncontroversial and is acceptable to all. The purpose of the amendment is to extend for 2 years the time in which military personnel and civilian employees of the Navy may continue to occupy war housing project RI 5-3, formerly RI-37013, also known as the Tonomy Hill project, which is presently owned by the Housing Authority of Newport, R.I.

The Lanham Act, as amended, provided that all war housing projects constructed pursuant to that act should be disposed of as expeditiously as possible when the need for such projects terminated. The act further provided that these projects would be conveyed to local housing authorities for use as low-rent public housing.

In attempting to abide by the provisions of the Lanham Act, the Administrator of the HHFA in early 1956, commenced arrangements to convey the Tonomy Hill project to the Newport Housing Authority. The Department of the Navy, however, objected to such conveyance because 360 units of the project were occupied by naval personnel who would have been forced to vacate the project if it were conveyed for low-rent purposes.

In order to avoid working a hardship on the nava. personnel then occupying the project since other rental housing in Newport was in extremely short supply, the Housing Act of 1956 provided the Administrator with authority to convey the project to the local public agency for low-rent purposes, except the act further provided the Newport Housing Authority with the authority to reserve 360 units of the project for a 3-year period to house military personnel, regardless of their income.

The 3-year period provided in the Housing Act of 1956 will terminate on December 31, 1959.

I am advised that the military personnel and civilian employees of the Navy now occupying this project still require such quarters, and unless the date for occupancy is extended, these personnel will be evicted. I am further informed that rental housing in Newport is still in short supply.

My amendment, therefore, would extend the time of occupancy of the 360 units by military personnel and civilian employees of the Navy for a period of 2 years.

It is my understanding that neither the Department of Defense nor the Housing and Home Finance Agency object to this extension. In addition, the extension has been requested by the Newport Housing Authority.

I have before me a telegram which I have received from William J. Donovan, executive secretary of the Housing Authority of the City of Newport, R.I. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEWPORT, R.I., February 4, 1959.

Senator JOHN O. PASTORE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Section 406(c) of the Housing Act of 1956 provided for the transfer of housing project No. RI–37013 to our authority and also for the transfer of two projects to the Philadelphia, Pa., authority. This section provided for priority for military personnel for 3 years with respect to a specified number of dwelling units. Section 705 of the housing bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency and being considered by the Senate today provides for the extension of preference for military personnel for an additional 3 years insofar as the Philadelphia projects are concerned. Would you be kind enough to attempt to amend section 705 to provide for an extension of the preference for 3 years insofar as the Newport project is concerned. Admiral Cormmelon, base commander in Newport, and we are in agreement that this amendment is desirable.

With our best regards.

WM. J. DONOVAN,
Executive Secretary, the Housing Authority of the City of Newport, R.I.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PASTORE. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. As I understand, the amendment would operate only with respect to one project.

Mr. PASTORE. It would operate with respect to only one project, concerning which an exemption was made at the time it was conveyed to the Housing Authority of Newport, R. I.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 117, between lines 19 and 20, it is proposed to insert the following:

(b) Such Act is further amended by inserting after the second sentence thereof a new sentence as follows: "The Administration is further authorized to make grants to State planning agencies for statewide comprehensive planning work including research and coordination activity directly related to urban needs."

On page 117, line 20, strike out "(b)" and insert in lieu thereof "(c)".

On page 117, between lines 21 and 22, insert a new subsection as follows:

(d) Such section is further amended by inserting "(a)" immediately following "Sec. 701", and by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(b) As used in this section the term 'comprehensive planning' means—

"(1) long range physical planning for all public facilities by the planning agency analyzing functional needs over a 20- to 30-year period based upon general planning data and future land use patterns integrated into an overall and composite plan;

"(2) long range fiscal planning by the planning agency and governmental fiscal authorities analyzing long range fiscal requirements, and preparing a fiscal program to meet the development costs;

"(3) capital improvement programing by the planning agency and governmental fiscal authorities to achieve a scheduling of improvement projects that comprise the first 5 to 6 years of the long range physical and fiscal plans based on a determination of relative urgencies;

"(4) integration and coordination of all functional plans of the interested governmental departments or subdivisions by the planning agency;

"(5) coordination of intergovernmental planned activities by the planning agency to achieve a reconciliation of planning activities among adjacent States, political subdivisions thereof, and authorized planning agencies; and

"(6) preparation of regulatory and administrative measures and programs in support of the foregoing. No grants made under this section shall be used to defray the costs of administration or enforcement of such measures or programs."

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I have discussed the amendment with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and they have agreed to take it to conference.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the committee discussed the general subject of the amendment to a certain extent. I am not certain just what the net effect of the amendment might be; however, insofar as I am concerned, I will be happy to take it to conference.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

I ask unanimous consent, in order not to consume an undue amount of time, to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a brief explanation of the amendment.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR SALTONSTALL IN EXPLANATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENT

Section 701 of the Housing Act of 1954 as amended now contains authority for the Housing Administrator to make planning grants to State planning agencies to provide assistance for planning work to be done by small communities lacking adequate planning resources. It also provides authority for planning grants in metropolitan and regional areas, cities, and towns, and counties which have suffered damage due to various catastrophic acts of God, and areas threatened with urbanization due to the impact of Federal installations.

The section contains no authority for planning grants for statewide planning work. Furthermore, the section does not in any way advert to the desirability of the planning now provided for or any statewide planning to be coordinated with planning in adjacent States or political subdivisions thereof.

The proposed amendment to section 701 would make it possible for the Administrator to make planning grants to State planning agencies in support of comprehensive planning work and would define the term "comprehensive planning."

The purpose of the amendment is to stimulate the States to make statewide plans and to coordinate such plans and the plans of political subdivisions of the States with each other and with the planning of adjacent States and political subdivisions of such adjacent States. The amendment is premised on the belief that the needs of particular cities and towns and regions within a State can most efficiently and effectively be met if they are considered as part of the larger and related needs of the State. It also recognizes that there is frequently a relationship between such needs and those of adjacent areas outside the State.

If the comprehensive planning contemplated by the amendment is carried out it seems reasonable to expect that all such needs will be better provided for in programs which may be developed to meet them. An obvious example may be seen in the case of Washington, D.C., whose planning should certainly be coordinated with that of adjacent States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the pending bill brings the 86th Congress face to face, for the first time, with the central issue in our public life. That central issue is whether we in the Congress, and the President too, will face up to the critical problems confronting our Nation and master them by bold action, or whether, through timidity and because of a reverence for obsolete pennypinching economic theory—a sort of fiscal folklore about the budget—we are going to pretend these problems do not exist or fail to deal with them.

Every Member of the Senate knows what these problems are. They are recognized, identified, admitted; but we have not yet faced up to mastering them.

One of these critical problems is housing for the American people. Our national goal was stated some 10 years ago in the Housing Act of 1949: "A decent home in a suitable living environment for every American family." We have made some progress towards that goal in the last 10 years, but not much. Estimates vary, but it is a fair statement that 10 million American families are presently living in homes which are either unsafe, unsanitary, or both. These are our slums—a national disgrace. Many of these slums are in rural areas, but a large majority of them are in the cities of America.

But we have other housing problems besides the slums. America's population is growing at an explosive rate.

New families are being formed daily. Old housing is steadily becoming uninhabitable or is being burned or is torn down. We would have a housing problem in America even if we had no slums.

Experts are in agreement that we need 2 million new housing units each year for the foreseeable future if we are to attain, within the lifetime of any of us in this Chamber, the goal set forth in the Housing Act of 1949: A decent home for every American family.

This bill takes a few short strides forward towards meeting that goal. It is a good bill and I shall support it on final passage; but it is not as good as it ought to be, and I hope the Senate will improve it as we move forward in the debate.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield to my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to tell the Senate who the authors of the Housing Act of 1949 were.

Mr. CLARK. Senator Wagner, Senator Taft, and Senator Ellender.

Mr. PROXMIRE. In the Senator's judgment, does the present bill, S. 57, carry out the objectives of the Housing Act of 1949?

Mr. CLARK. I would rather put it this way. It takes a few short strides in that direction. However, to my way of thinking it is inadequate. I have a feeling that perhaps the late distinguished Senator from Ohio, who is no longer with us, and who was one of the original authors of the bill, would find himself in agreement with me in my statement if he were here today.

Mr. PROXMIRE. It is interesting to me that the great Senator from Ohio, who was recognized widely as an outstanding conservative statesman——

Mr. CLARK. Not that our present Senators from Ohio are not also great and distinguished.

Mr. PROXMIRE. They are indeed.

Mr. CLARK. And one of them is also conservative.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Exactly. It is interesting to me that Senator Taft, who was recognized widely as Mr. Republican and as a conservative Republican, set forth the goal which has been only partly achieved, and the principle of which is only partly lived up to by the bill under consideration, and which is being attacked—it is almost inconceivable—by present day conservatives as radical and extravagant spending. It seems to me that this is an excellent example of reaction and moving backward; I do not like to use the term in a derogatory sense.

Mr. CLARK. It is an indication of political lag. I firmly believe that we politicians have lagged behind the American people in their desire to move forward in this regard. I thank my friend for his participation in the debate.

The tools utilized by this measure to help build more homes for Americans are:

First. Government guarantees of mortgages to enable speculative builders to construct and sell homes to middle- and upper-class Americans. Incident to this program are the operations of the Federal National Mortgage Association which helps provide a market for these guaranteed FHA and VA mortgages. These privately constructed housing developments, aided by Government guarantees, are being built largely in the suburbs and, to a lesser extent, in rural areas. The regular FHA program has only a minor impact in our core cities, so far as new housing is concerned.

Second. A comprehensive program for renewing and rehabilitating our cities. The objective of this urban renewal program is to clear the slums and replace them with sound wealth-producing housing built in a decent environment, adequately equipped with utilities, parks, and playgrounds. An important part of this program is the rehabilitation and renewal of existing structures which are on their way to becoming unsafe or unsanitary, and which can be saved as decent housing by the expenditure of a little private money.

Third. A program of public housing intended to provide safe and sanitary shelter for low-income families unable to afford decent private housing on either a rental or homeownership basis. Progress of the urban renewal slum clearance program has accelerated the need for public housing. So has the urban highway program. So has other governmental action which requires the relocation of low-income families. Since the urban renewal law prohibits slum clearance until families to be displaced can be rehoused in safe and sanitary shelter, failure to provide enough public housing units can kill the urban redevelopment program.

There is a clearly indicated need for additional rental and homeownership housing for moderate income families—those whose incomes are too high to make them eligible for public housing and too low to permit them to buy or rent private homes which are safe and sanitary. Extensive hearings conducted by the Housing Subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee during the last few years established these facts beyond any reasonable doubt. Yet the bill makes no adequate provision for meeting these needs.

Even in the relatively narrow field of relocating middle-income families displaced by governmental action, existing programs under section 221 of the present housing law have been of little value in that wide area east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio and Mason-Dixon line, where most American families live.

Fourth. Decent shelter for the elderly. This bill does provide the first substantial program of housing for elderly persons. I hope it will work.

Fifth. Important provisions relating to college housing and classroom facilities, armed services housing, and various miscellaneous matters, with none of which I shall deal in this speech.

To meet the needs of these various groupings of American families and individuals the bill makes the following provisions:

First. An additional $10 billion of FHA mortgage insurance is authorized for the current fiscal year and for fiscal 1960. This additional insurance will permit private builders to continue to construct and sell housing for those American families whose annual income, in most urban localities, is $6,000 and over, and afford a new house built with an FHA guarantee. It is important to emphasize that, on the basis of all past experience, this insurance program will never cost the Federal Treasury one red cent. Even in the depths of the depression of the thirties the Home Owners Loan Corporation, a far more ambitious program in terms of the extent of Federal aid, was able to operate at a profit to the Treasury. So those who are concerned about the possibility of Federal expenditures in excess of budget requests need take no fear from this FHA program. In point of fact, the administration wanted to take the ceiling off entirely. There are no budgetary implications in this program.

I think that is worth a little emphasis. The administration is willing to take the roof right off FHA guarantees, the program used to build housing for upper-income families, and used to create new suburbs, but the administration is as pennypinching as old Scrooge in the Christmas carol when it comes to making any money available for public housing or for urban redevelopment.

The Senate has just approved, by a bipartisan agreement, an authorization of $150 million for direct loans for veterans' housing. This is necessary to enable those veterans who live in rural areas, removed from the normal channels of banking credit, to acquire homes on the same reasonable credit basis which is available for their colleagues in suburban areas. While this program does call for a temporary outlay of cash by the Treasury, past experience indicates that the loans are sound and will be repaid in due course with interest. I suggest that those who protest new Federal expenditures should distinguish between outright expenditures and loans which are repayable with interest—just as every businessman or every housewife or every well-run city, so distinguishes. In other words, they should relax and support this program. In the end, it will cost the Government nothing. It increases the capital wealth of America and, in so doing, brings additional revenue to the Federal Treasury through the income taxes on those who build and sell and finance the housing.

Second. In the field of urban renewal the bill calls for the authorization of what are designated as grant reservations of $350 million a year for 6 years, with an authorization to the President to increase this sum in any one year to $500 million by borrowing from the authorization for future years if he finds it necessary to carry out the objectives of the program. Thus a 6-year program might conceivably be telescoped into a little more than 4 years.

I suggest, however, that it is pretty unrealistic to think that the President would ever exercise the right which is given to him under the bill, since he has made it clear that he is not in sympathy with even the minimum rate of progress in slum clearance called for by the bill.

I am happy that the Senate has rejected, by a fine majority, the effort to substitute the President's totally inadequate program of urban renewal for the program in the bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Let me again suggest to my colleagues that they should not take fright at the magnitude of these figures. It is anywhere from 3 to 5 years after a grant reservation is made before the Treasury is called upon for a single dollar of Federal money. Thus, this urban renewal program can have no conceivable effect on the budget for fiscal 1960 or 1961; and its effect on the 1962 budget will be minimal. In fact, cash expenditures in fiscal 1960 for the entire urban redevelopment program authorized since 1949, a program whose grant reservations total $1,350 million, is only $104 million. This is a dramatic example of the wide gap stretching over a long period of years between a grant authorization and the expenditure of Federal funds.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I congratulate the Senator from Pennsylvania on emphasizing this point. It seems to me that in the debate so far, since the housing bill was reported to the Senate, the entire emphasis in opposition to it here in the Senate has been on its effect on the budget. This emphasis has come directly from the White House. It has come through the President's spokesmen in the Senate, both minority leader and the ranking Republican on the Committee on Banking and Currency. They have emphasized, over and over again, a balanced budget, and they have tested every provision in the bill on the basis of its effect on the budget.

I think it is very important that the Senator from Pennsylvania has made it crystal clear that the urban renewal provisions in the bill, urban renewal provisions which I am encouraged to hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will offer in his amendment, will in no way affect the 1960 budget or the 1961 budget.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator from Wisconsin is quite correct. I am glad he has emphasized that point again. I hope we can finally get it across to the American people. I am hopeful that our good friends of the press will stop talking about the budget implications of a $2,100 million give-away program, because—and I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin is correct—I think most of the American people today who follow these matters only in the newspapers believe that we on this side of the aisle are preparing to spend $2,100 million in the 1960 budget in excess of what the President has asked for. That is so untrue that it is laughable.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I should simply like to add one point, which I think it should be emphasized throughout the discussion, particularly when we debate the Senator's amendment. The urban renewal money, far from constituting simply a threat to the Federal budget, will, it seems to me, and in the judgment of any competent, fair-minded economist, very likely constitute only a very small loss to the Federal budget, conceivably no loss at all.

Mr. CLARK. In the long run.

Mr. PROXMIRE. In the long run, or even in the fairly short run; because as the money is actually appropriated and spent, there is in very short order an addition of 5 times to 10 times, or even 15 times, as much private money which is also spent in construction.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct. I shall speak about that later in my speech.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The money constitutes income which economists tell us means that for every $5 or $6 of income, $1 of Federal tax revenue will be received.

This all adds up to the fact that urban renewal money is a marvelous investment in every sense of the word. It comes back to the Federal Treasury. It does not constitute irresponsible spending.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator for his very clear explanation of that point.

In point of fact, the sums provided for urban renewal in the pending bill are grossly inadequate. Unless they are increased, it is inevitable, in my judgment, that the program of slum clearance in the cities of America which is just getting under way will receive a crippling, if not a fatal, blow.

I turn to the minority views in the committee report to document this statement.

Although the minority views were signed by only four members of the committee, two other distinguished Senators joined with us in supporting the amendment, which I shall offer later, to increase the urban-renewal grant. So the actual vote in the committee on the amendment which I shall propose, was 9 to 6.

The minority views describe in some detail what happened last year when the Urban Renewal Administration found itself with insufficient funds and was forced to institute what is called rationing of the limited authorization it had available.

The rationing program was ordered into effect on September 8, 1958, a day which is referred to by the mayors and other city officials as "black Tuesday."

Wherever a city had on file an application for a really bold and adequate project to reconstruct a blighted area or a slum, that city was told in effect: "Your project is too big. We do not have the money. Take it back and scale it down, or else we will simply put it on the shelf until Congress makes more funds available."

Thus, the plans which have been put together by the united effort of civic leaders and city officials—encouraged by the promise of Federal help contained in the housing acts, beginning with the Housing Act of 1949—must either be scrapped or mangled or indefinitely postponed. The tempo of the program is lost; the enthusiasm and the hope that had been kindled are dimmed.

The effect on individual cities is set forth beginning on page 82 of the hearings. This table only shows, however, the communities which had applications already on file; it does not show the cities which have yet to enter the program. Many of those will undoubtedly be precluded from early participation unless the amounts in the committee bill are raised.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, the table which begins on page 82 of the committee report. The table is entitled, "Title I, Capital Grant Contract Authorization—Approval Actions September 8–December 31, 1958, for Localities With Applications Pending September 5, 1958."

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Amounts shown under "Applications pending" include all applications (both for new projects and for increases in existing projects) pending on Sept. 5. For many cities, more than 1 application was pending on Sept. 5.

[2] Amounts shown under "Approval actions" include all amounts approved for the cities with applications pending on Sept. 5. Excluded are amounts approved after Sept. 5 for cities with no applications pending on Sept. 5.

[3] Limit for 3 years.

[4] Limit for 2 years.

[5] Represents amounts approved as increases in existing project(s), including amounts approved under applications received after Sept. 5.

[6] Reflects transfer of reservations made prior to fiscal year 1959 between projects, as agreed in fiscal year 1958.

[7] Reflects (a) transfer of reservation of $709,022 made prior to fiscal year 1959 to general neighborhood renewal planning operation approved for the same area, plus (b) increase of $1,636,978 in the reservation, subject to formula limit.

[8] New York City had been subject to a limitation of not to exceed 10 percent of available authorization for 1959 prior to beginning of fiscal year and was therefore entitled to have applications up to this amount considered.

[9] Represents revision in amount of reservation requested originally in survey and planning application pending on Sept. 5.

[10] Reflects transfer of reservation made prior to fiscal year 1959 for existing general neighborhood renewal planning operation to urban renewal project approved for planning in the neighborhood area.

[11] Reflects actual amount of reservation requested in application pending on Sept. 5. Amount of $16,384 shown under "Applications pending" reflects a reporting error.

[12] Reflects transfer of reservation made prior to fiscal year 1959 for existing urban renewal project to general neighborhood renewal planning operation approved for the same area.

[13] Reflects (a) transfer of reservations made prior to fiscal year 1959 in amount of $1,304,000 between projects, as agreed in fiscal year 1958, plus (b) new reservations approved in the amount of $4,587,300 subject to formula limit.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, at this point, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield to my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think this point in the Senator's speech should be a critical one to all other Senators. I know that in my State of Wisconsin, La Crosse, which is just beginning an urban renewal program, is likely to be very seriously handicapped—in fact, it probably will not be able to have an urban renewal program for a number of years—unless the present committee bill is improved. La Crosse is a typical American city, with a population of 50,000; and I am sure a great majority of Senators have similar situations in their own States.

If this housing bill is to have any effect on urban renewal, I think the provisions the Senator from Pennsylvania is advocating must be adopted. It is true that these provisions will also help the larger cities. Of course the larger cities have established programs under way. I believe it is the smaller cities throughout the country that will be most seriously handicapped unless the committee bill is amended in the way the Senator from Pennsylvania has proposed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin is quite correct. I should like to amplify what he has said by pointing out that presently 384 cities in the Nation, in 41 States, the District of Columbia, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico, are engaged in urban-renewal projects. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a list of those cities. The list, prepared by the Urban Renewal Administration, shows the extent of their participation in urban renewal.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Urban renewal programs—Capital-grant reservations and contracts [1] as of Dec. 31, 1958

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, among those 384 cities are 37 in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. I would hazard the guess that another 25 cities in Pennsylvania alone now are making plans to request urban-renewal grants, although they have not yet reached the point of making application for grant reservations; and I am sure that what is true of Pennsylvania is true generally throughout the country.

During the hearings, we asked Commissioner Steiner, of the Urban Renewal Administration, how much money would be needed to keep pace with the plans the cities have put forward. His answer was that applications have been coming in at the rate of $40 million a month, after those which were rejected or withdrawn have been deducted, and that the rate has been rising. Thus, the annual rate is around $500 million a year, and is going up. On page 80 of the report is a tabulation showing that, taking into account the backlog, the need between now and June 30, 1960, is around $1.1 billion. That is why I have been advocating an authorization of $600 million a year. Joined by several of my colleagues, I shall, at the appropriate time, offer an amendment to raise the authorization.

Mr. President, later, when I call up my amendment, I shall return to the subject of urban renewal.

My fourth point is that the bill authorizes carrying over into the fiscal year 1960 the existing unused authorization for public-housing units—which probably will amount to about 16,000—and authorizes the construction of an additional 35,000 units, or a total of 51,000.

Mr. President, last night and this morning I was reassured, indeed, when efforts of the administration to kill the public-housing program were rejected by a majority of the Members of this body. I am confident that if those efforts had succeeded, we would have struck another crippling blow at the urban renewal-slum clearance program.

While this authorization will probably be adequate for the fiscal year 1960, personally I would have preferred a long-range program which would have turned loose the remaining unused authorization of about 190,000 units, as contained in the Taft-Ellender-Wagner Housing Act of 1949. In this way, we could have given assurance to American cities that they could unquestionably provide, in the years ahead, not only for the families of low incomes who must be relocated by reason of governmental action, but also for the many thousands of low-income families now living in slums for which renewal programs are not as yet even on the drawing boards.

The bill also makes some administrative changes intended to decentralize administration of the public-housing program. These provisions are not only salutary, they are essential to the revitalization of the public-housing program across the country. Redtape, bureaucracy, and unsympathetic centralized control over the public housing administration in Washington have tied the hands of dedicated local leadership in their efforts to take care of unfortunate families now living in unsafe and unsanitary housing.

This bill does not contain all of the provisions for decentralization which were approved by the Senate last year, and were introduced in the original version of Senate bill 57, as well as in my own bill, S. 193. However, this bill makes a beginning. I am content with the committee bill as a compromise at this point, although I believe that the Senate should keep a continuous watch upon the operation of the program so as to see whether other measures, to prevent this program from being strangled by redtape, will need to be taken in the future.

Mr. President, in that connection I should like to call attention to a letter which begins on page 34 of the committee report. The letter is addressed to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN]; and it comes from the Public Housing Commissioner, Mr. Charles E. Slusser. I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUBLIC HOUSING ADMINISTRATION,
HOUSING AND HOME FINANCE AGENCY,
Washington, D.C., January 28, 1959.

Hon. JOHN J. SPARKMAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SPARKMAN: Please accept my regrets that illness prevented me from meeting with you Tuesday morning, January 27, and accept my thanks for the courtesies you extend to my representatives.

The modification of present Federal practice with respect to fiscal auditing, and budgetary review and approval desired by local housing authorities can best be accomplished, in my judgment, administratively under a new policy mandate established by the Congress. This procedure would have advantage both to the Federal and local interest in the administration of the low-rent housing program.

With respect to fiscal audits, the provision which now precludes a local housing authority from securing an independent audit from a qualified public accountant is contained not in the statute but in section 311b of the standard form of annual contributions contract between the Public Housing Administration and local housing authorities. This section can be waived so as to permit a local housing authority should it so desire to obtain its own audit and treat the cost thereof as an eligible operating expense. By retaining administrative flexibility, we could satisfy the desires of local housing authorities and at the same time not interfere with the staffing and programing of PHA fiscal audits as would result were each local housing authority in a position to elect shortly before the beginning of each fiscal year to have a private or PHA fiscal audit. With administrative flexibility, the amount of advance notice required of local housing authorities could be varied from time to time so that the joint objective of local option and an orderly PHA audit program could be achieved.

With respect to budgetary review and approval, this, also, is a requirement of the annual contributions contract and not a specific provision of the law. Last year PHA adopted a completely modified and improved budget system. Many local housing authorities have expressed their satisfaction with it and we have been commended for its installation. Indeed, when I met with committees of local housing authority commissioners throughout the country during 1958, I discussed with them the desirability of PHA's relinquishing the approval of local housing authority operating budgets.

There were differing viewpoints. Some commissioners felt that properly they should have and would welcome full responsibility and authority over their operating budgets. Others, however, felt that they needed and welcomed PHA's review and comments.

Again, these viewpoints can be reconciled administratively. Local housing authorities could file their budgets with PHA. This is required so that PHA can prepare intelligent forecasts of annual contributions requirements. The PHA staff could then review and furnish the local housing authority commissioners with comments and suggestions on the local housing authority's operating plans and costs. The local housing authority commissioners would then be in a position to consider the proposals of their own staff, the PHA comments and make their own decision. This would provide both local independence and discretion and Federal advice and assistance.

To my mind, this administrative practice would be preferable to legislative changes in the statute, coupled with a directive to change all existing annual contributions contracts to incorporate them, for one very cogent reason. This procedure is experimental. If instituted by precise legislative requirements and contract modification, should the Congress subsequently become dissatisfied with the results, it would be unable to restore the status quo since local housing authorities would be protected by contract even against the power of the Congress. On the other hand, should this innovation in Federal practice be instituted administratively under congressional mandate, coupled with the requirement to report the results back to the Congress after an experimental period, say of 2 years' duration, there would be no contractual barrier to the Congress exercising its judgment and authority as it deems best suited to the public interest.

Further, by following the administrative route, should any particular situation arise which calls for prompt action in the interest of the low-rent housing program, these waivers could be withdrawn in the specific situation. It is unlikely that such a situation would occur but freedom to move might be essential under what are now unforeseeable circumstances.

To effectuate this arrangement, we would suggest the inclusion in legislation of language in the U.S. Housing Act directing the Public Housing Commissioner to vest the power in local housing authority commissioners to exercise their judgment with respect to the operations of the low-rent housing program to the maximum extent compatible with the accomplishment of the objectives and provisions of the statute. This legislative change, coupled with a statement in the committee report setting forth the above-outlined administrative modifications in PHA procedure and practice, would assure the institution of the changes and give the Congress an opportunity to evaluate the results.

Should these suggestions commend themselves to you, we should be happy to meet with your staff to work out the technical details involved.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES E. SLUSSER,
Commissioner.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the language in the committee report points out very clearly, as does the statement of public housing policy which appears in title IV of the pending bill, that it should be the policy of the Public Housing Administration to decentralize, insofar as possible, all of its activities in relation to the local public-housing authorities.

I hope that we are now making some legislative history which will indicate the clear legislative intent of the Senate—that the administration should cut red-tape and stop interfering with the local authorities. It should stop telling them, for example, where to put Coca-Cola machines—as it did last year—and stop telling them what pail and what mop to buy—which happened last year—and stop telling them to remove trees, and then be unable to tell the local authority which trees to remove—which occurred last year. I hope we are making it plain that we want the local authorities given the maximum control over their own affairs, and that the policy of the Senate is decentralization, the maximum amount of local control, and the minimum amount of interference by the Central Government in Washington.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield further to me?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it the understanding of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the letter received by the chairman of the Housing Subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee from Commissioner Slusser—I refer to the letter which appears in the committee report on pages 34 to 36—constitutes a substitution for the enactment into law of the decentralization provisions for which the Senator from Pennsylvania himself is pleading? In other words, the letter in the committee report is intended to take the place of a statutory enactment. I say that because, as discussed in the deliberations of the Banking and Currency Committee, that was my clear understanding.

Mr. CLARK. It was my understanding also. I may say to my friend from Wisconsin that the more I read the letter, the more I am confused by the gobbledegook contained therein. If I can read between the lines in an attempt to interpret what was the thought of the writer of the letter, I am not at all sure it constitutes a commitment to carry out this decentralization policy, at least so far as audits are concerned.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Was there any doubt on the part of any member of the committee, on the majority or on the minority side, that the intention, the purpose, the objective of the letter was to provide for the kind of decentralization the Senator from Pennsylvania has been talking about?

Mr. CLARK. I think my friend is correct. In that connection, I call his attention to the specific provision in section 401 of title IV, the low-rent housing section of the present bill, which reads as follows:

> It is the policy to vest in the local public agencies the maximum amount of responsibility in the administration of the low-rent program with due consideration to accomplishing the objectives of this Act while effecting economies.

I think what the Senate means by that is: "Keep your hands off the local public authorities unless and until you have reason to believe that they are not properly performing their public duties."

The need for such decentralization has been developed by witness after witness in hearings before the committee. The local housing officials are leading citizens in their communities. They are serving without pay, as dedicated public servants. They are giving their time and efforts to make the public housing programs in their own communities work. I think it is an affront to their intelligence and integrity to have bureaucrats from Washington tell them, "Do this. Do that. Don't do this. Don't do that." Local authorities have been harassed to such an extent that in many places it has slowed down the public housing program in the last few years more than has any other thing.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not interesting that for 20 long years the Republicans complained about bureaucracy and the dead hand of the bureaucrat?

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. It was that issue more than any other that permitted them to triumph in the 1952 elections. It was a good and an honest issue. It is an issue which the American people will recognize whether the Democratic Party or the Republican Party is in control of the Government. I think one of the evils of big government has been excessive and unnecessary control from Washington. The issue is clear. Democrats and Republicans both agreed it was essential that the Public Housing Administration decentralize to the greatest possible extent.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator is correct. I will recall to his mind it was stated in the hearings that the Public Housing Administration has 1,600 employees. I suppose in order to give them something to do, they have to be sent to harass local public housing authorities. I would hope when we come here next year, as an indication of the decentralization program which the act calls for, there might be at least a 25 percent cut in the payroll of the Public Housing Administration.

I turn now to my fifth point. The provisions of the bill which establish a new program of housing for the elderly have been fully outlined by the able Senator from Alabama. I will not expand on what he has said, except to say that this new program meets a need that has been critically felt for a long time. I think it deserves everyone's support.

I return to my initial theme. This bill requires the United States Senate to face up to a critical program confronting America. There are alarming signs of softness in our country—signs which no one has read more clearly than the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, the Chairman of our Banking and Currency Committee [Mr. FULBRIGHT] in a series of brilliant speeches he made on this floor last summer. He referred to the self-indulgence, the emphasis on luxury, the juvenile and adult delinquency, the lack of self-discipline, the tendency to sweep hard facts under the rug, the unwillingness to ask the people for any sort of sacrifice, and, finally, the lack of national leadership, as dangers of our time. Too many people want to buy Cadillacs and Coca-Cola; too few people are determined to see that there is decent shelter for our children and their parents.

Yet I believe that the election returns of last November indicate a profound public discontent with this condition. I believe the people elected candidates who will look to the future and not to the past, who promise action rather than inertia. I believe further that most of the men who won in that election and their colleagues in this Senate are prepared to meet that mandate to move forward. This was a mandate to political leaders to master our problems, to take control of our destiny, not to continue to drift and to fumble.

Now what obstacles do the timid place in our way? It is the old, old song: "We can't afford it—we must cut costs and balance the budget."

Let me state at the outset my own strong belief that the Federal budget should be balanced for fiscal 1960, but I do not want to balance the budget at the cost of inferiority abroad and mediocrity at home. Nor do I believe that expenditures to meet our needs must necessarily result in an unbalanced budget. I have no doubt that, when faced with the clear and unavoidable issue of providing more Federal revenues or living in a second-class America, the people of this Nation will support the Members of this body, if we have the political guts to provide the additional revenue.

In that connection, Mr. President, there appeared in this morning's paper three extremely interesting examples of what I have in mind. I particularly call this point to the attention of my friends on the opposite side of the aisle—now entirely barren except for the presence of the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART]. I call to their attention, when they read the RECORD tomorrow, an editorial in the Washington Post and Times Herald of this morning, entitled "Rockefeller's Millions." I read the first sentence, which is as follows:

> Governor Rockefeller's recommendations for a $277-million increase in New York State taxes are fiscally responsible and may be good politics as well.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial may appear in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROCKEFELLER'S MILLIONS

Governor Rockefeller's recommendations for a $277 million increase in New York State taxes are fiscally responsible and may be good politics as well. The Governor's willingness to meet most of the expanding demands on the New York budget with a tax increase indicates that he has a good deal of political courage. Such a forthright approach to New York's revenue problems ought to offset whatever political deficits may accrue to a Governor whose first major decision is to ask the legislature to raise the taxes paid by almost every voter in the State.

The additional revenue will be used to help balance New York's first $2 billion budget. By paying more State income, cigarette, gasoline, and estate taxes New York residents will provide for the financing of more school and highway construction and the expansion of many State services. There are no new spending plans of any consequence in the Rockefeller budget. Many of the increases in expenditures for such existing programs as State aid to education and highway construction are mandatory.

Mr. Rockefeller's approach to New York's finances is surely more realistic than the pinch-penny attitude taken by Governor Tawes in Maryland where he balanced a $448 million budget without a tax increase but at the expense of many essential State services. We think that most Americans are prepared to pay for adequate government services, even if this means higher taxes. Mr. Rockefeller's call for tax increases probably has not diminished the value of his presidential stock by one dime.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest to my good friend from Indiana, in the most friendly possible way, that perhaps he would be willing on some occasion in the near future to go to the White House and suggest to his friend there that the great Republican Governor of New York has shown the way toward fiscal responsibility and budget balancing, in a way which perhaps could well be emulated at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I am always happy to yield to my friend from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. My position is and has been for a couple of days—and I have made myself clear many, many times—that the responsibility for appropriations and expenditures is entirely, 100 percent, the responsibility of the Congress. The President does not have a single nickel to spend except the money which is appropriated by the Congress.

Mr. CLARK. My friend would agree, would he not, that the Congress is always very much influenced by the recommendations the President makes, which is proper?

Mr. CAPEHART. I agree with that, and I do not think it should be the case. I think that is what got us into much of our trouble when, back during the Roosevelt and Truman days particularly, the Congress was a "me, too" Congress and did everything those two gentlemen asked to have done.

Mr. CLARK. I hope my friend will agree with me that we do not want the 86th Congress to be a "me, too" Congress.

Mr. CAPEHART. That is my position exactly. The fiscal policy is our responsibility and not the responsibility of the President. We ought to consider his budget and we ought to consider the facts which he submits, and then we ought to use our own good judgment. We ought to accept the responsibility 100 percent, because it is ours.

Mr. CLARK. I have no quarrel with the Senator at all. The Senator and I are in accord on that point. I think this is our responsibility.

I will say to my good friend from Indiana that in my humble judgment the President of the United States made a serious mistake in the national interest when he fixed the budget at $77 billion. I do not think that is a realistic figure.

Mr. CAPEHART. That may well be true. The law requires the President to fix some figure. He fixed the budget at $77 billion. It is up to the Congress, to the House and to the Senate, to decide what the budget ought to be, and Congress should decide it. Congress is responsible to the people, and responsible only to the people.

Mr. CLARK. I hope my good friend from Indiana will also agree with me that when—as I think in all likelihood we will—we exceed the $77 billion, it will also be the responsibility of the Congress to find revenues to balance the budget.

Mr. CAPEHART. I agree with the Senator 100 percent on that.

Mr. CLARK. I think that is a question of "political guts" and we might as well face up to it.

Mr. CAPEHART. I am not one who subscribes to the idea that every bill should be cut. I think with reference to the particular bill under consideration we could take some money from it, and we have done so. Perhaps we could take more, but we have not. It does not necessarily follow, though, that the next bill which comes up for consideration should be cut. Good common horsesense might dictate to us there should be an increase.

I do not say that every bill which we consider requires a cut of expenditures. We should not necessarily follow every suggestion to cut. At times it might be good common horsesense to increase expenditures, if the facts indicate that is the proper thing to do. However, wherever we can we should cut expenditures if we are not interfering with the end results or hurting the project. I think in those cases we ought to cut expenditures.

There perhaps will be times when it will be good business and good sense to provide an increase in expenditures. I do not say we should always make cuts, any more than we should provide increases. I say that we ought to take the responsibility, because it is ours. Only we can do anything about the matter.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. CAPEHART. The President cannot do anything about it. There are only 98 Senators and 436 Members of the House of Representatives who have the responsibility.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator is correct, but I will point out that the President got us off to a very bad start by proposing an inadequate budget. I look forward to the day when my good friend from Indiana will join me in sponsoring the Capehart-Clark "Let's close the tax loopholes" bill.

Mr. President, the second item in this morning's paper bearing on this subject was Mr. Walter Lippmann's column. I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from the column published this morning be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The fatal error lies in the decision of the President to make the paramount issue of the present time a Federal budget balanced at the existing level of taxes, along with a promise of a reduction of taxes before the next presidential election. We are approaching one of the great climaxes of the cold war and the President's decision about the paramountcy of the budget reflects a failure to understand the nature of the cold war.

It makes suspect all the military estimates in the budget. For it is no part of the law of the land, or of that moral law which the President frequently invokes, that the existing tax structure cannot be raised and should be lowered. To insist on such a dogma about taxes is to tell the people and the world that national defense is not the first but only the secondary consideration in this government.

What should be done about it? It should be said in no uncertain terms that defense has the first priority. If the President will not say it, perhaps Congress itself should say it by resolution. There should then be a substantial increase in the military appropriations, an increase sufficient to put us back into the missiles race. Then an increase of taxes should be voted in order to balance this larger budget.

I am aware that the extra money invested in making more of the existing missiles may be "wasted"—wasted in the sense that these missiles will soon be obsolete and good only for the junk pile. But the race of armaments is in the same sense inherently wasteful since the objective is to make weapons which will never be used and will soon be obsolete.

Nevertheless we are in a race of armaments. It would be a great day for mankind if it could be ended. But if the race is to be ended, this will be done only if and when we are able to reach general political settlements with the Communist powers. The race of armaments cannot be ended or suspended merely because we wish to balance the budget without raising taxes or because it would be good politics to reduce taxes before the next election.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the point which Mr. Lippmann makes is the one which I have been making:

The fatal error lies in the decision of the President to make the paramount issue of the present time a Federal budget balanced at the existing level of taxes, along with a promise of a reduction of taxes before the next presidential election. We are approaching one of the great climaxes of the cold war, and the President's decision about the paramountcy of the budget reflects a failure to understand the nature of the cold war.

Also, Mr. President, this decision makes it difficult to deal with the needs of our domestic economy—the need to refurbish the public sector of the economy, to go forward with programs of housing, education, water resources, and the like. Every individual who gives these matters even the most casual study will have to conclude we cannot do what is needed at a budget level of $77 billion. I will be the first to join with any other Member of this body to cut out unnecessary waste, but I simply do not think this can be done.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I am glad to yield to my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is there not another way in which we can help balance the budget? Would it not be possible for our Federal Government to follow policies to encourage growth?

Of course I recognize an urban renewal program adopted by the present Congress could not help balance the budget for at least 3 or 4, or possibly 5 or 6 years. Nevertheless, is it not true that if we are going to be able to balance the budget at reasonable rates of taxation in the future and if we are going to be able to provide for the defense which is so necessary at this time, it is essential that our Federal Government adopt policies which provide for long-term growth?

Mr. CLARK. The Senater is eminently correct. If the Senator will permit me to continue for a moment, I think one of the great blots on the record of the Eisenhower administration is that during the 6-year term of office of the administration the rate of growth has slowed down to a very slow walk—I believe only 1 or 2 percent each year—whereas before the present administration took over the growth rate was approximately 3 percent. I think we all believe the growth rate could be brought up to 5 percent. We are faced with the stark reality that the Russian growth in gross national product is at a rate of 10 percent.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator is exactly correct. There has been a great deal of talk in the Senate and by many commentators as to the dangerous difference between the Russian economic growth and the American economic growth, but there has been very little talk about precisely and exactly what the Federal Government can do to encourage growth.

I should like to suggest that the Federal Government should develop the capital assets and growth assets of this country by encouraging construction of dams, power sites, rivers and harbors improvements, and research particularly in agriculture; but, so far as our cities are concerned, and particularly so far as the section of the country from which the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Wisconsin come is concerned, the obvious and perhaps the preeminent way in which the Federal Government today can promote growth is through the adoption of an urban renewal program which will enable the cities to rebuild their blighted and slum areas.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. It is not true that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania is likely to be one of the key amendments—perhaps the key amendment—to be considered in the present Congress for a determination of whether Members truly believe the Federal Government should take leadership in providing for long-term economic growth, so far as the great metropolitan centers of our country are concerned, in which centers 65 percent of our people live?

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator is absolutely correct, and I think the question which confronts us with regard to the bill presently under consideration is whether we are going to finish what was started by former Senator Taft, former Senator Wagner, and the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. ELLENDER), or whether we are going to quit halfway down the road and accept a course whereby we permit our blighted areas to continue to grow faster than we are able to weed out slums and blight.

That is the issue, as I see it, between the provision for urban renewal in the pending measure and the provision in the amendment which I shall shortly offer.

Mr. President, at his press conference yesterday, President Eisenhower had some things to say in defense of his $77 billion budget and his reluctance to ask for any increased revenues, beyond a nominal amount. I think it is well worth while, in the context of the President's press conference, to recall what several of the leading economists of this country said when they testified before the Joint Economic Committee last Friday. Five of the six distinguished economists who appeared before the committee were in accord that taxes should be raised right away and that to do so would be salutary.

One of them, Herbert Stein, of the Committee for Economic Development, began his testimony with these words: "What this country needs is a general tax increase."

Paul A. Samuelson, who has written a definitive textbook on economics used in our schools and colleges, said: "Instead of pressing for massive tax reductions at this time, Congressmen and Cabinet officers should be alert to the possibility that it could become desirable in the year ahead to begin to worry about raising tax rates in the interest of overall stability."

For myself, I do not believe a general tax increase is necessary. Certainly the minor budgetary implications of this bill could be met with additional revenues by closing any one or more of half a dozen tax loopholes, the inequity of which comes close to being a national disgrace.

In that connection, I invite the attention of Members of this body to a memorandum which appears on page 285 of the hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency. The memorandum is entitled, "A Tax Program for 1958." It was prepared by economists of the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations. While I do not vouch for the accuracy of their figures, I will say that the men who work in the economic section of that great labor organization are qualified economists, well trained, and generally know what they are doing.

I should like to quote their recommendations for recapturing needed revenue by eliminating loopholes and tax escape clauses in the Federal income tax laws. They say:

A total of $9.1 billion in revenue could be raised by the following measures (the approximate amount of revenue to be recaptured is shown in parentheses after each item):

I ask unanimous consent that the entire memorandum, of which paragraph 3 deals with tax loopholes, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A TAX PROGRAM FOR 1958

1. Tax relief for low and moderate income families.—This is a basic need at the present time. While there are several ways of achieving this result, perhaps the simplest and most preferable would be, as a first step, to raise personal individual exemptions from $600 to $700.

2. Eliminate the requirement that workers pay income taxes on their contributions to Government retirement funds.—One very special tax problem of workers is the fact that the present law forces them to pay income taxes on income which is actually used to contribute to various Government retirement systems (old age and survivors insurance, civil service, and railroad retirement). This inequity should be eliminated by excluding these contributions from income for income tax purposes and from wages for withholding purposes. However, there should be an upper limit of $500 placed on the amount of contributions that could be thus excluded from income.

3. Recapture needed revenue by eliminating loopholes and tax escape clauses in the Federal income tax.—A total of $9.1 billion in revenue could be raised by the following measure (the approximate amount of revenue to be recaptured is shown in parenthesis after each item):

(a) Repeal the special tax relief granted to dividend income by the Revenue Act of 1954 ($400 million).

(b) Require withholding taxes on the payment of dividends and interest ($300 million).

(c) Repeal excessive depletion allowances and remove from such tax privileges many of the metals and minerals now covered ($1,300 million).

(d) Tighten the capital gains tax structure by lengthening the holding period of long-range gains and increasing considerably the 25 percent tax rate. Remove from capital gains treatment the many types of income not originally included ($1,000 million).

(e) Repeal the new depreciation provision of the 1954 Revenue Act ($1,300 million).

(f) Eliminate the advantage given upper income married couples and heads of households by the income-splitting provision ($3,500 million).

(g) Eliminate the family partnership provisions which are designed to reduce individual income taxes ($100 million).

(h) Eliminate stock option privileges designed to circumvent payment of taxes ($100 million).

(i) Repeal the tax-exempt status of State and local bonds ($100 million).

(j) Eliminate the carry-back, carry-forward provision of the corporate income tax which grants special tax windfalls to purchasers of corporations with heavy losses ($100 million).

(k) Make the estate and gift taxes a more effective source of revenue by eliminating life estate provisions and by combining estate and gift tax exemptions as well as reducing the total level of exemptions ($1,000 million).

4. Ease the tax burden on small corporations.—This can be done by changing the two component rates of the corporate tax structure. Rather than a 30 percent normal rate and a 22-percent rate on all income above $25,000, the normal rate could be lowered to 25 percent while at the same time correspondingly raising the surtax rate. The total rate would remain the same, but some measure of relief would be granted to small corporations.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield to my good friend from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. One of the items of tax favoritism is the foreign tax credit. I do not know whether that is referred to in the statement to which the Senator has alluded.

Mr. CLARK. No; that is not referred to in the memorandum, but I think it is an additional factor which should be given careful consideration by the Senate. It affects largely the oil companies, does it not?

Mr. GORE. It affects the oil companies, but it also affects all businesses which are American-owned, but which do business abroad. Under this provision there are a number of American concerns with very large profits, which pay virtually no taxes to the U.S. Government.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator, as an eminent member of the Finance Committee, is well aware of that fact. I hope his committee will bring the facts forward during the course of the current session.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GORE. With that brief reference to sources of additional revenue, I invite the attention of the able Senator to a way by which vast savings could be made.

In 1945, the year when World War II closed, the U.S. Government had a public debt of $258 billion. The interest paid on the public debt for that year was $3,621 million. President Eisenhower estimates in his budget that in 1960 we shall have a national debt of $283 billion and he requests $8,100 million to pay the interest on that debt.

Mr. CLARK. Will my friend explain to us how that increase occurred during the Eisenhower administration?

Mr. GORE. It has occurred by reason of a deliberate policy of our Government to raise interest rates, to increase the income from interest, not only on governmental obligations, but also on private debt.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator see any justification for that policy?

Mr. GORE. I would not say that I see no justification. On balance, I say it is very unjustified. I would have to define the word "justification." I see vast benefits accruing to certain people from this policy.

Mr. CLARK. I am talking about the national interest, not individual interest.

Mr. GORE. The national interest is adversely served by this policy.

Mr. CLARK. What does my friend think about the defense of our friends on the other side of the aisle, that high interest rates are necessary to prevent inflation?

Mr. GORE. One of the most inflationary elements in our national economy is the trend toward higher and higher interest rates. One of the principal costs of doing business is interest on borrowed money. How can we avoid price increases when the cost of doing business is continually increased by an inflationary interest spiral?

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend.

Mr. GORE. Here is a difference between $3,621 million interest on public debt in 1945 and $8,100 million estimated for 1960. A realistic monetary policy on the part of our Government designed to serve the public interest, would save vastly more money for the American taxpayer every year than the annual cost of the pending bill.

Mr. CLARK. There is no question about that. I invite the attention of my friend, as I have done on previous occasions, to the fact that the United States is the only government in the world whose central government does not control its banking system through a central bank which is subject to the jurisdiction of the government, and not to that of an independent board of bankers.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me in order that I may propound a question to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CLARK. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. The question I should like to ask the able Senator from Tennessee is this: What rate does he think the Government should pay at the moment on its bonds and borrowings?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GORE. If the Senator from Indiana is making reference—as I presume he is—to the pending bill——

Mr. CAPEHART. I am making reference to the fact that the Senator from Tennessee said the public debt was $258 billion in 1945, and is estimated to be $283 billion for 1960. The Senator used some figures showing that the interest rate in 1949 was costing about $4 billion a year, whereas it is now costing $8 billion.

My question is, Where would the Senator set the interest rate on Government bonds? Would he increase it to any extent over the rate which prevailed in 1945? Where would he place it?

Mr. GORE. In the first place, the junior Senator from Tennessee is not the Secretary of the Treasury; nor is he a member of the Federal Reserve Board.

I would not be able to answer the able Senator from Indiana in an offhand manner as to the exact interest rate which Government obligations should now bear.

Mr. CAPEHART. Does the Senator believe that it should have been increased at all?

Mr. GORE. I would have to think about that.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator also made the statement and left the inference that this was a policy which was deliberately brought about by the administration.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator not believe that?

Mr. CAPEHART. I never heard anything which, in my opinion, was as nonfactual as that statement.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator believe it to be an accident? Does the Senator think it is an accident that in the past 12 months we have had a drastic reduction in the interest rate on Government bills, and that, later during the same period, we have had a most drastic increase in the interest rate on these bills? Does the Senator believe that it just happened that way, without plan or action by anyone?

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator does not understand how these matters are handled. The Government sells these bonds——

Mr. GORE. As I understand, the Senator says that it is not by design, that it is not by plan, but that it just happened to be so. How does the Senator understand it happened?

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator's inference was that there was some sinister motive behind it. I say to the Senator that that is the most nonfactual statement that I have ever heard made on the floor of the Senate. It is not sinister. The Government is paying the going rate of interest on its bonds. The Senator, in my opinion, is merely trying to appeal to the emotions of the people.

There is one other question I should like to ask. The Senator said that someone is getting this interest. I should like to ask, who owns the bonds of the U.S. Government?

Mr. GORE. Before I answer the second question, I should like to inform the able Senator that I did not use the word "sinister."

Mr. CAPEHART. No; I used it.

Mr. GORE. Yes; the Senator used it.

Mr. CAPEHART. That was the Senator's inference.

Mr. GORE. But the Senator attributed it to me. The Senator has made statements which I will not characterize as the most nonfactual statements I have ever heard. However, I must characterize them as quite naive.

Now let the Senator ask his further question.

Mr. CAPEHART. My point was that the Senator was trying to leave the impression that there was something wrong with the fact that the interest rates had gone up.

Mr. GORE. I was not merely trying to leave the impression. I say it is wrong. It is a deliberate policy to raise the interest rates.

Mr. CAPEHART. Why does the Senator object to my using the word "sinister"? He says it is deliberate. That means it was planned, and that there was collusion.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator say it was not planned?

Mr. CAPEHART. I say it 100 percent.

Mr. GORE. Then I see no point in arguing the question with the Senator.

Mr. CAPEHART. No one knows the truth of my statement better than the Senator. If he does not know it, then he absolutely does not understand how the U.S. Government sells its bonds and arrives at the interest rate. That is done in the open market. The Government pays no more and no less than the going rate. In every instance, the Government tries to sell its bonds at a rate of interest as low as it possibly can. For anyone to say that that is not true means that the person saying it does not understand how the matter is handled. It is an unfortunate situation that we should permit to go into the RECORD an accusation against such a gentleman as the Secretary of the Treasury at the present time and the gentleman running the Federal Reserve and other financial institutions in our country, that they are deliberately doing things to raise interest rates on Government bonds. It is a very unfortunate statement.

Mr. GORE. I find it quite difficult to believe that I am hearing what I am hearing. How could it be that without purpose, without plan, without deliberate action, in June of 1958, when the country was suffering a recession, the interest rate on Government bills was reduced to less than 1 percent, 0.881 percent; but that in December of the same year it was increased to 2.8 percent. That is more than a 200-percent increase in 6 months. Yet the senior Senator from Indiana says that this just happened, without purpose, without plan, and without action on the part of the Government of the United States. I wonder if the Senator could explain how it did happen.

Mr. CAPEHART. It happened in the same way that all prices in the United States go up and go down, and for the same reason that commodity prices go up. Three months ago I sold hogs on my farm at 22½ cents. I sold hogs last week at approximately 16 cents. That is a reduction of about 30 percent. I believe it was for the same reason that the Senator's salary has been increased during the last 10 years from $10,000 to $22,500 a year. The people who buy the bonds are the American people, and they pay for their bonds out of their savings. They are entitled to an increase in interest rates on their savings, because everything they buy—their food, clothing, automobiles, furniture—has gone up and up.

To say that the man with $10,000 who is willing to put the money into Government bonds should not have more interest paid to him than he received 10 years ago, when money—and possibly it is more than 10 years ago—was worth twice as much, is not being very realistic. The interest rate on bonds goes up and down with the market. The interest rate goes up with the cost of living. That is only fair, if we are to be honest with the people who save their money and have it available with which to buy Government bonds.

If the Senator wishes to take the position that the Government should freeze the interest rate, that is another matter. The Government could do it. The Government could freeze the interest rate. It could freeze wages and it could freeze prices. It could freeze all the other things. However, it is not right to say that the people who handle our financial affairs—the Secretary of the Treasury, and the other people who handle our financial affairs—would deliberately do things which would increase the interest rate. I do not believe there is any truth in that statement. They may use poor judgment, although I do not know about that. I do not believe they use poor judgment. However, when the Senator says that they knew what they were doing and that there was collusion, and that it was a deliberate action to increase the interest rate on Government bonds, I do not believe it.

Mr. GORE. I thank the senior Senator from Pennsylvania for yielding to me. The senior Senator from Indiana has just stated his knowledge and his understanding of this problem, and I am willing to have the RECORD stand as it is.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield to my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I merely wish to say to my good friend from Indiana that if the Governors of the Federal Reserve Board have not planned what has been happening to the interest rate ever since 1951, when the accord was reached, it seems to me that they should be prosecuted for taking their salaries under false pretenses.

This is their whole function, namely, to manage our monetary system. That has been my understanding. If that is not true, I will be delighted to have the Senator from Indiana disabuse my mind. The head of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Martin, made a series of speeches justifying their policy of raising interest rates some times and lowering them at other times, saying that it is our only useful weapon against inflation. That statement has been reported over and over again in financial publications. I would be delighted if the Senator from Indiana could tell me what the function of the Federal Reserve Board is if it is not to manage our monetary system.

Mr. GORE. Perhaps it is merely to record accidents that occur.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, from this edifying discussion of high finance, I return to the prosaic discussion of expense accounts. This is an additional item of potential Federal revenue which I am confident, with proper attention by the Director of Internal Revenue, if we were to give him enough help, and if we made a very modest change in the existing law, would result in hundreds of millions of dollars, if not in excess of a billion dollars, of additional revenue. It might be revenue from the yacht builders. It might be from the distillers. It might make trouble in the Stork Club. It might be that one or two musical comedies in New York would close a little sooner than they otherwise would. But there would be an increase in the rate of tax collections. I hope that this loophole, which is not one of those mentioned in the list inserted in the RECORD a short time ago, will be fully explored.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. GORE. That is a loophole, not written into the law, but arising from lax administration of the law.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is absolutely correct. If the Eisenhower administration would merely enforce the law, this additional large sum of money could be picked up without hurting anyone, with the exception of, possibly—and I say this in lighter vein, with all due respect to the Senator from Indiana—a few contributors to the Republican Party.

Let me say a word about some of the folklore which surrounds the subject of public spending. Perhaps on no other topic in our time has there been spoken so much nonsense.

The timid, who fear additional public spending, are the victims of five main fallacies.

The first fallacy is that private spending is inherently good and that public spending is inherently bad. This is nonsense.

It is thought that when a man buys a Cadillac there is something morally just and right about it; but that when a city builds a school, that is something which should be looked at with some concern, because it is public rather than private spending.

The second fallacy is that the Federal Government is crushing our people and endangering the economy with a growing burden of taxes, expenditures, and debt, and that this threatens the health of our free enterprise system. This, too, is nonsense. The fact is that in relation to our gross national product these burdens have been growing lighter—not heavier.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, a table, based on data from the economic report of the President of January 1959, showing the relation of Federal debt to gross national product during the years 1945 to 1957, inclusive.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Relation of Federal debt to gross national product, 1945–57

Calendar year	Total gross national product	Gross public debt and guaranteed issues at end of period [1]	Ratio of debt to GNP
	Billions	Billions	Percent
1945	$213.6	$278.7	130
1946	210.7	259.5	123
1947	234.3	257.0	110
1948	259.4	252.9	97
1949	258.1	257.2	100
1950	284.6	256.7	90
1951	329.0	259.5	79
1952	347.0	267.4	77
1953	365.4	275.2	75
1954	363.1	278.8	77
1955	397.5	280.8	71
1956	419.2	276.7	66
1957	440.3	275.0	62
1958 (preliminary)	436.7	283.0	65

[1] A small portion of the amounts shown in this column are not subject to the debt limit.

Source of data: Economic Report of the President, January 1959.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, Senators will see, from this table, that in 1945 the gross national product was $213.6 billion; that the gross national debt was $278.7 billion; and in that year our national debt was 130 percent of the gross national product.

In 1958, the preliminary figures show that the gross national product was $436.7 billion; that the gross national debt was $283 billion, and that the ratio of the debt to the gross national product had decreased from 130 percent to only 65 percent.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Those are very interesting figures. Was the first year 1935?

Mr. CLARK. No; 1945.

Mr. PROXMIRE. And the last year was what?

Mr. CLARK. The last year was 1958.

Mr. PROXMIRE. So this has taken place in only 13 years?

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct. In other words, the expansion of the gross national product has been continuous, whereas the increase in the national debt has been relatively slight.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a second table prepared from data in the same Economic Report of President Eisenhower, of January 1959, entitled "Trend in Governmental Revenues in Relation to Gross National Product," may be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Trend in governmental revenues in relation to gross national product

[Dollars in billions]

Fiscal year	Gross national product	Federal budget receipts	Percentage of gross national product	State and local revenues	Percentage of gross national product
1946	$211.4	$39.8	18.8	$11.5	5.4
1948	224.8	41.5	17.0	15.4	6.3
1950	271.2	36.5	13.5	18.4	6.8
1952	336.8	61.4	18.2	22.6	6.7
1953	354.3	64.8	18.3	24.4	6.9
1954	362.2	64.7	17.9	26.0	7.2
1955	376.5	60.4	16.0	27.9	7.4
1956	403.2	68.2	16.9	31.3	7.8
1957	432.1	71.0	16.4	34.5	8.0
1958	434.8	69.1	15.9	(1)	(1)

[1] Not available.

Source of data: Economic Report of the President, January 1959.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, we find from that table that in 1946 the Federal Government took in revenues 18.8 percent of the gross national product, whereas in 1958 Federal revenues had sunk to 15.9 percent of a much larger gross national product.

So, in effect, the Federal Government was tapping the operating wealth of America, the receipts of America, the gross national product, to the tune of almost 3 percent less last year than was the case in 1946.

In considering this bill, and the ability of the States and local governments to meet their needs for good housing, for slum clearance, and for urban redevelopment, it is quite significant to note that from 1946 through 1957 State and local revenues had tripled, rising from $11.5 billion to $34.5 billion, and that the percentage of the gross national product taken by State and local governments had risen from 5.4 percent to 8 percent.

This increase emphatically indicates the enormous additional load placed on the cities and States during the years since World War II.

This table, I believe, contains convincing evidence that the States and localities are bearing more than their fair share of the load, and the Federal Government is perhaps not bearing anything like enough.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a third table prepared from data in the Economic Report of the President of January 1959, which shows the declining Federal share in the total tax burden, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The declining Federal share in the total tax burden

Fiscal year	State and local revenues [1]	Federal budget receipts	Total	Federal share
	Millions	Millions	Millions	Percent

[2] Preliminary.
Source of data: Economic Report of the President, January 1959.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I point out that in 1946 the Federal share of the total tax take was 77 percent, whereas in 1957 the Federal share of the total tax take had decreased to 67 percent. I believe those figures further demonstrate that it is a fallacy to say that the Federal Government is crushing our people and endangering the economy, and that the States and localities are not bearing their fair share of the total load necessary to keep America strong at home.

The third fallacy is the notion that Federal spending is inflationary. Government spending is no more inflationary than private spending, provided the Government balances its budget. But even additional deficit spending is inflationary only when the demand for goods and services exceeds supply—a condition which clearly does not exist today with our production at only 75 percent of capacity or less, and unemployment still at intolerable levels—11 percent of the total labor force in my State.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Did it ever occur to the Senator that there is really no pressure on and no shortage of goods and services? They are all available, mostly at reasonable prices. But what is really keeping inflation going is that certain industries are organized in such fashion that the leaders of those industries can simply raise prices whether their action is justified or not.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is referring, I assume, to the well-known wage-price spiral in the so-called administered price industries. That is, I agree, certainly one of the most significant factors that contribute to inflation.

Mr. LONG. Certainly in the major industries, the ones which have led the way in the trend to inflation, there is not the price competition which should be a part of the American competitive system.

Mr. CLARK. I agree with the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. That, in my judgment, is what is causing inflation. To raise interest rates on veterans housing or to raise interest rates on the public debt on the theory that inflation will be stopped is simply adding fuel to the fire, if we ignore the real cause of inflation.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator has made an excellent point.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I support enthusiastically the point made by the Senator from Lousiana. An excellent study by Gardner Means documents this subject beautifully. It shows that in industries which are administered, in which there is tremendous power, coupled with strong unions, prices have increased rapidly since 1953.

In industries which are not so situated, particularly the processors of farm products and the manufactures of textiles, prices have fallen. It is clear that this is not the usual kind of monetary inflation, with an excess of demand chasing a scarcity of goods, because if that occurs, we shall be confronted with what confronted us from 1944 to 1953—namely, all prices rising.

But that has not been had at all. Instead, there has been a selective inflation, a kind which cannot be dealt with at all by controlling monetary inflation. That is a point we must remember.

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend.

Mr. President, the fourth fallacy is that all Federal expenditures called for by the budget are alike. There is a tendency to see no difference between a loan, which is sure to be repaid with interest, and an expenditure for personal services or the purchase of supplies and materials, which comes back only in part to the Government, through the income tax. I am confident that the intelligent people who comprise this body will distinguish, for purposes of public discussion, between operating expenses, loans which create account receivable, and investments made in national wealth. Every cent called for by this particular bill will, in the long run, either be repaid with interest or will create taxable wealth far in excess of the Federal investment.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield again to me?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I hesitate to interrupt the Senator from Pennsylvania, because he is making an excellent speech. But this point cannot be stressed too often: It is extremely important to differentiate between spending as a result of grants, which are not returned, and spending on the basis of loans.

Furthermore, the Bureau of Internal Revenue does not operate in this way. If we try to tell the Bureau of Internal Revenue that our loans are expenditures, and that we would like to subtract them from our income, for tax purposes, consider how far we would get. Obviously we would not get very far at all.

So I believe we should stress the point the Senator from Pennsylvania is making—namely, that we need an effective budget, because it must be made very clear to the American people that this bill simply calls for investments—not spending—by their Government.

Mr. CLARK. Certainly the Senator from Wisconsin is correct. Again I point out that there is not one well-run city in the Nation that does not differentiate between its capital budget and its operating budget; and I do not know of any well-run business that does not do so, as well. So far as I know, the only governmental unit in the world that does not make that distinction is the Government of the United States; and I believe it is time it did make that distinction.

I believe that it was stated on the floor of the Senate, the other day, that in the magazine U.S. News & World Report there has appeared an article which indicates that if the Federal budget were redrawn, so as to separate loans, on the one hand, from operating expenses, on the other, not only would the budget be balanced, but a substantial surplus would actually be shown.

Indeed, the testimony taken by the committee establishes that every dollar of Federal expenditure under the urban-renewal program generates from $3 to $15 of additional private expenditure which, in its turn, creates taxable income for the Federal Government.

Mayor Dilworth of Philadelphia testified that, in his city, $10 of private expenditure for each dollar of governmental expenditure in the urban-renewal program could be clearly established. Thus does tax money expended in the public sector of the economy reproduce itself many times over in additional private tax-generating payments.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield at this point?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I wonder whether the Senator from Pennsylvania, who, when he was the mayor of Philadelphia, had so much experience in connection with this matter, will describe the tax situation in the case of such cleared lands.

Mr. CLARK. Of course, in Philadelphia, applications for urban-renewal funds will be made for two purposes: First, to replace quite a number of unsightly dwellings and slums; second, to renew a number of very historic old houses which were built shortly after William Penn first founded Philadelphia.

In the case of one of those old houses, the land around it has already been cleared. The shell of the house still stands, and has been bought by Mayor Dilworth himself; and he has spent in the neighborhood of $100,000 of his own money to fix it up. This is a good example of how private spending goes into the economy through an urban-renewal program.

The same is true of other private developments. For instance, our merchants and our good citizens of Philadelphia have pledged themselves to spend $250 million of private funds for the rehabilitation of the central or core area of our city, including the creation of a brandnew residential area in what used to be called the Old Philadelphia district, where William Penn and the other early settlers lived.

Mr. PROXMIRE. And this $250 million will go to the other side of the budget, will it not?

Mr. CLARK. Of course; it will go to builders, lumber dealers, and so forth; and, therefore, much of it will be returned to the Federal Government in the form of taxes as a result of the creation of wealth where nothing but blight existed before.

Mr. PROXMIRE. So this is an unusual kind of Federal grant, inasmuch as each dollar of Federal grant also generates from $3 to $15 of private funds; and those amounts in the aggregate are taxed. The economists tell me that for every $5 of income, the Federal Government obtains $1 of revenue. So, in that sense, this program comes very close—although perhaps it does not balance completely—to being self-liquidating.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Wisconsin is correct; and, of course, he has mentioned the enormous increase which has occurred in the local tax base, which comes from the same investment.

The fifth fallacy is the notion that if the Federal Government pushes its functions back to the States and cities, that will constitute sound finance and, indeed, economy. It is hard to see how economy will result at all if the functions are performed. In that event, the question is simply which taxing system is used and which level of government carries out the administration. In urban renewal, administration is decentralized and Federal controls are not oppressive; and this bill includes provisions which give municipalities even greater flexibility. But we have retained the Federal share of the cost at two-thirds. To lower the Federal share—as the administration desires—would only shift the burden from the Federal tax system, which is more equitable, to the property and sales taxes imposed by the States and municipalities; which are regressive. That the Federal tax structure is superior is hardly open for serious discussion. The Federal tax burden falls evenly across the land. Taxpayers cannot ordinarily threaten to flee the Nation, as they can flee a city or a State. Where the choice exists, there are many good reasons to use the Federal system in preference to those of the States and localities.

But even if this were not true, it is folly to expect State and local governments to pick up any significant part of the tab which the Federal Government rejects. Two days ago, in the Senate, the eminent and respected senior Senator from Montana, Mr. MURRAY, whom I am happy to see in the Chamber at this time, demolished that particular fallacy. He said:

> The administration does not seem concerned over the difficulty State and local governments have in meeting even present obligations—difficulties which in many cases are greater than those faced by the Federal Government. Nor does the administration seem concerned about some of the real problems in this country which must be met by government—Federal, State, or local.

Senator MURRAY, in quoting from the January, 1959, issue of the Monthly Review, published by the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, cited some disturbing figures about the increase in State and local indebtedness. The outstanding debt of all State and local governments in the United States will amount to approximately $55 billion at the end of the fiscal year 1959. This figure is 3.5 times the amount in 1945. $26 billion of the $38 billion rise in total debt during this period has been in the debt of local government. Despite this fact, the rise in State debt has been more rapid. At the end of 1945, obligations of State governments accounted for 15 percent of the combined State and local debt. By the end of fiscal 1958, State debt had risen to 27 percent of the total.

Quoting from the January, 1959, issue of the Monthly Review published by the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, Senator MURRAY stated:

> It has become part of the folklore of the country that we have a tremendous Federal debt and that it has been continuously growing. The facts are that it has not grown on balance for over a decade, that relative to the growth in the rest of our financial structure the national debt has declined to only half the size reached at the end of World War II, and that it is at its most manageable size in nearly 2 decades.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one quick point?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not true that the debt is even less burdensome, if we also allow for the lesser value of the dollar and for the per capita consequences, that is, the fact that this is now a much larger country, and many more people have been added to the population in the period the Senator is discussing, and the fact that the value of the dollar has diminished in value?

Mr. CLARK. I may point out that we are talking of gross national product also in terms of a devalued dollar, so the other side of the equation comes into play.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am glad the Senator has corrected me; but I am referring to the debt in per capita terms, which is so often forgotten in these discussions.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct. The Senator will recall that I asked the Federal Reserve Board to furnish me figures with regard to the per capita increase in the gross national product. I had hoped to put those figures into the RECORD today.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a table prepared from data in the Economic Report of the President of January 1959, entitled "Increase In State and Local Indebtedness Since World War II."

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Increase in State and local indebtedness since World War II

State and local debt

Year (as of June 30):	Billions of dollars
1946	13.6
1948	16.2
1950	20.7
1952	25.8
1953	28.6
1954	33.4
1955	38.4
1956	42.7
1957	46.7
1958 (prelim.)	50.9

Source of data: Economic Report of the President, January 1959.

Mr. CLARK. I call to the attention of my colleagues the fact that as of the fiscal year 1946, State and local indebtedness amounted to $13.6 billion, whereas the preliminary figures for fiscal 1958 show that the debt has increased to $50.9 billion.

Finally, Mr. President, let me say a word about the condition of our American cities, in which a majority of all Americans now live. They are oppressed with the failure to meet the critical problems of sprawling metropolitan areas; their traffic and transportation problems are becoming so serious that strangulation of their economic growth is already under way. Their shelter and housing problem is critical. The financial resources of these local governments and of the States in which they are located are incapable of dealing successfully with these problems without the massive aid of the Federal Government. What we need is more, not less, support for the urban areas of America. The great domestic problems in the second half of the 20th century are urban problems. We are no longer a predominantly rural society.

This bill, if properly amended on the floor, will go far toward enabling the Federal Government to measure up to its responsibilities toward those citizens and local governments which are in drastic need of help.

I turn now to my amendments to the pending bill. I should like to speak briefly first to my amendment identified as 2–3–59—E, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At the end of the bill to insert a new title as follows:

"TITLE VIII—RELOCATION HOUSING FOR DISPLACED FAMILIES OR PERSONS

"SEC. 801. (a) The purpose of this title is to assist private nonprofit corporations to provide relocation housing and related facilities for displaced families, or persons, of low or moderate income.

"(b) In order to carry out the purpose of this title, the Administrator may make loans to any corporation (as defined in section 804(2)) for the provision of rental housing and related facilities for displaced families, or persons, of low or moderate income, except that (1) no such loan shall be made unless the corporation shows that it is unable to secure the necessary funds from other sources upon terms and conditions equally as favorable as the terms and conditions applicable to loans under this title, and (2) no such loan shall be made unless the Administrator finds that the construction will be undertaken in an economical manner, and that it will not be of elaborate or extravagant design or materials.

"(c) A loan to a corporation under this title may be in an amount not exceeding 98 per centum of the total development cost (as defined in section 804(3)), as determined by the Administrator; shall be secured in such manner and be repaid within such period, not exceeding fifty years, as may be determined by him; and shall bear interest at a rate determined by him which shall be not more than the higher of (1) 2¾ per centum per annum, or (2) the total of one-quarter of 1 per centum per annum added to the rate of interest paid by the Administrator on funds obtained from the Secretary of the Treasury as provided in subsection (e).

"(d) To obtain funds for loans under this title, the Administrator may issue notes and obligations for purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury in an amount not to exceed $250,000,000 outstanding at any one time.

"(e) Notes or other obligations issued by the Administrator under this title shall be in such forms and denominations, have such maturities, and be subject to such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Administrator, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such notes or other obligations issued to obtain funds for loans under this title shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury which shall be not more than the higher of (1) 2½ per centum per annum, or (2) the average annual interest rate on all interest-bearing obligations of the United States then forming a part of the public debt as computed at the end of the fiscal year next preceding the issuance of such notes or other obligations by the Administrator and adjusted to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per centum. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase any notes and other obligations of the Administrator issued under this title, and for such purpose is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such Act, as amended, are extended to include any purchases of such notes and other obligations. The Secretary of the Treasury may at any time sell any of the notes or other obligations acquired by him under this section. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of such notes or other obligations shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States.

"SEC. 802. (a) In the performance of, and with respect to, the functions, powers, and duties vested in him by this title the Administrator shall (in addition to any authority otherwise vested in him) have the functions, powers, and duties set forth in section 402 (except subsection (c)(2)) of the Housing Act of 1950.

"(b) The Administrator is authorized and directed to insure priority of occupancy to displaced persons or families in housing constructed with a loan under this title.

"SEC. 803. (a) Housing constructed with a loan made under this title shall not be used for transient or hotel purposes while such loan is outstanding.

"(b) As used in subsection (a), the term 'transient or hotel purposes' shall have such meaning as may be prescribed by the Administrator, but rental for any period less than thirty days shall in any event constitute use for such purposes. The provisions of subsections (f) through (j) of section 513 of the National Housing Act (as added by section 132 of the Housing Act of 1954) shall apply in the case of violations of subsection (a) as though the housing described in such subsection were multifamily housing (as defined in section 513(e)(2) of the National Housing Act) with respect to which a mortgage is insured under such Act, except that for purposes of this section the Administrator shall perform the functions vested in the Commissioner by such section 513.

"SEC. 804. As used in this title—

"(1) The term 'housing' means (A) new structures suitable for dwelling use by displaced families or persons, and (B) dwelling facilities provided by rehabilitation, alteration, conversion, or improvement of existing structures which are otherwise inadequate for proposed dwelling use by such families and persons.

"(2) The term 'corporation' means any incorporated private institution or foundation no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private shareholder, contributor or individual, if such institution or foundation is approved by the Administrator as to financial responsibility.

"(3) The term 'development cost' means costs of construction of housing and of other related facilities, and of the land on which it is located, including necessary site improvement.

"(4) The term 'displaced families or persons' means families or persons who are to be displaced by construction, development, redevelopment, or renewal activity undertaken by any public body, or by the action of a public body or court, either through the enforcement of housing standards or through the demolition, closing, or improvement of dwellings, or who were so displaced within three years prior to making application for admission to dwellings provided pursuant to this title. The Administrator shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to prevent abuses in determining, under the definitions contained in this paragraph, the eligibility of families and persons for admission to, and occupancy of, housing constructed with assistance under this title.

"(5) The term 'State' includes the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the Territories and possessions of the United States.

"(6) The term 'Administrator' means the Housing and Home Finance Administrator.

"(7) The term 'construction' means erection of new structures, or rehabilitation, alteration, conversion, or improvement of existing structures.

"(8) The term 'family or person of low or moderate income' means any family, or person, whose net income is insufficient to enable such family or person to obtain, without the assistance of this title, decent, safe, and sanitary housing accommodations in the locality at rentals within the ability of such family or person to pay."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, this amendment calls for a loan program of $250 million to be used for the purpose of mortgages up to 50 years in duration, with an interest rate around 3 percent, covering up to 98 percent of the cost of the development for the purpose of constructing relocation housing to take up a part of the load which will be coming on us as a result of urban redevelopment, slum clearance, the highway program, and other governmental action.

It was made abundantly clear during the hearings before the committee that the present sections of the housing law, namely, 221 and, to a lesser extent, 220, are just not working in terms of providing relocation housing for families displaced by redevelopment programs in the area east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio River and the Mason-Dixon line.

I regret to say we shall find ourselves in a situation where the public housing law will not be adequate to take care of all these displaced families. Quite a number of them have incomes in the range of $4,500, $5,000, and $6,000 a year, and will be ineligible for public housing, but they will not be able to find safe and sanitary housing in the private market.

This program, if adopted by the Senate, will meet that problem, at least to the extent of $250 million, and would give us a pilot project for determining to what extent provision of middle-income housing would be of benefit to the country at large.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to endorse as a personal finding the statement being made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. In my own State of New York, and particularly in the city of New York, there probably is a greater amount of urban renewal and other forms of redevelopment work taking place than in any other section of the country. The city is losing population, because people who are uprooted as a result of such redevelopment work, and who are middle-income people, find it cheaper to get a house in the country, which may be much more inconvenient in terms of their business or social life, but who are nevertheless compelled to do so by the economics of the situation.

This results in the city, which has provided tremendous utilities and other assets for its citizens, losing a population of, generally speaking, a highly desirable kind. I do not think that is in the interest of the United States. I deeply believe the kind of approach which has been suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania is essential to meet that problem.

In New York we have authorized $150 million in loans by a State agency for just such a purpose, under the so-called Mitchell-Lama program. I believe it is an intelligent approach. We talked about balanced housing standards. Certainly, this is a way to obtain one.

I also point out that where it is money which represents the difference between the capability for extending housing to middle income families or not—and that is what it is; it is low interest money which makes it possible, nothing else—there we come into the Lincolnian concept of government. Lincoln said the Government should not do anything which the people could do for themselves better than the Government could; but if the people could not do it better for themselves, indeed could not do it for themselves at all, then the Government should do it. It seems to me this is the very area in which that concept fits.

Any doctrinaire idea that we should not make direct loans goes out the window, because we make them to the REA's we make them to farmers, we make them to many, many other segments of the population; but when it comes to the city dwellers, who pay most of the taxes, and who are 100 million strong, we suddenly get doctrinaire and full of principle and say, "No, not for them, not even a few million dollars"—compared to the hundreds of millions of dollars which have gone in the other directions which I have named.

It is also important to point out that we are going to authorize some direct-loan money for veterans, under the provisions of the bill, and I thoroughly agree with that. We are probably going to authorize some direct-loan money for colleges, which is also needed.

I deeply believe the suggestions made in the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania are eminently sound.

I am not kidding myself, nor is the Senator from Pennsylvania. We may not get anywhere with this in the bill presently under consideration, but as sure as fate if we are going to continue to try to remake the face of America in terms of housing we must have, between public housing and housing which is largely attributable to Government guarantees of mortgages, this kind of program. Otherwise we will be disenfranchising in housing terms a material and very large section of the population.

I know the Senator from Pennsylvania and I will continue our effort along this line, because it is eminently needed and eminently correct. I congratulate the Senator for his initiative on this particular fight and the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend from New York for his support and for his kind comments. As the Senator said a moment ago, he and I are not kidding ourselves about the fate of the amendment.

This amendment was supported by a number of the mayors and other witnesses before our committee who live every day with the problems of urban housing.

I queried the representatives of the home builders, when they came before our committee. I asked them how they would like to build some houses under such a section, and they said—and I believe I quote them correctly—"It seems too good to be true." They were enthusiastically in favor of the proposal.

I point out again that the amount involved is relatively minor in comparison with the total Federal budget. It would create wealth and would destroy blight, and it would be sound fiscal policy to thus create wealth and help take care of the people who need to be relocated.

Mr. President, the matter was brought to a record vote in the committee. I am happy to say my good friend from New York [Mr. JAVITS] supported our position; as did the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], who has been so active in the debate this afternoon; as did our good friend, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS]; and myself; and the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS].

However, there were twice as many members of the committee who disagreed with us. Since I am confident we could not prevail on a yea-and-nay vote, or on a voice vote, and since I do not wish unduly to detain the Senate in this regard, Mr. President, I now withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 305 of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 305. The first sentence of section 103(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended to read as follows: "The Administrator, on and after July 1, 1949, may, with the approval of the President, contract to make capital grants, with respect to projects assisted under this title, and to make grants pursuant to subsection (c) of this section, aggregating not to exceed $1,350,000,000, which limit shall be increased by $600,000,000 on the date of the enactment of the Housing Act of 1959 and on July 1 in each of the years 1959 to 1967, both inclusive: Provided, That such limit and any such authorized increase therein, may be increased, at any time or times, by additional amounts aggregating not more than $150,000,000 if such action is necessary to meet the needs of pending bona fide applications on file with the Administrator: Provided further, That the amount of capital grants contracted for under this title prior to July 1, 1968, shall not exceed an aggregate of $7,350,000,000."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the amendment would increase the urban renewal grant authorization program, which is now without money, in the amount of $600 million a year for a period of 10 years. This is the amount which in my judgment, and in the judgment of our municipal officials, is essential to keep the urban renewal program going at full blast now that it has gotten off the ground. I have no doubt every cent would be utilized for the creation of wealth.

We must again be sure we understand that from 3 to 5 years elapse after the grant authorization is issued before any Federal money is spent, and that probably 17 years would pass before the last Federal money would be spent under this authorization. This amendment would have no impact whatever on the current budget, on the 1960 budget, or on the 1961 budget.

The amendment was supported in the hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency by the American Municipal Association and the U.S. Conference of Mayors, which together represent over 13,000 local governments throughout the United States. The testimony of the representatives of those two organizations I thought was effective and convincing.

The provision was also supported by the National Association of Housing and Redevelopment Officials, the National Housing Conference, the American Institute of Planners, the AFL–CIO, and others.

In order that the record may be complete, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a portion of the resolution on urban renewal of the American Municipal Association, presented to our committee by Mayor Celebrezze, of Cleveland, on behalf of the association.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

URBAN RENEWAL

Spreading slums and blight threaten to engulf American cities bringing misery to tens of millions of our fellow citizens and periling our municipal governments with bankruptcy. Local and State governments do not have the resources to finance unaided the massive urban renewal program which is required if this shame of American cities is to be destroyed. Large scale and continuing Federal assistance is urgently required unless and until such time as the Federal Government restores to the States and to local governments the resources and taxing power which would eliminate the need for Federal assistance.

Urban renewal is an essential device for preserving the economic health of our urban communities. Not only do 65 percent of the American people live in cities, more than 75 percent of Federal revenues from all sources come from cities. If cities are to continue through their manufacturing and commercial activities to contribute so much to the wealth and prosperity of our Nation they must be given the help they need to root out their industrial and commercial, as well as their residential, slums, and blighted areas.

The establishment of an adequate Federal program of urban renewal is the top priority of the 1959 national legislative program.

We protest the establishment of a rationing formula which puts all municipalities on a starvation diet for new capital grant reservations and we urge the Congress to write into law a requirement that capital grant reservations are to be made available to municipalities on the basis of applications made and indicated willingness to put up the local one-third share of net project cost.

We object vigorously to the administrative orders issued by the Urban Renewal Administration which destroy the concept of local plans locally arrived at and which require the cutting back of project plans in the interest of economy to the point that they offer no assurance that blight will in fact be eliminated. We urge the Congress to state emphatically that the responsibility for devising workable urban renewal projects is a local responsibility not to be hamstrung by Federal administrative regulations.

We recommend that the Congress amend the Housing Act of 1949 (as amended) as follows (1958):

Recognize the long-term needs of urban renewal and authorize a 10-year program with an annual authorization of additional capital grant reservation funds of $600 million a year with a provision for acceleration of up to $150 million if local demand requires a larger authorization in any given year (1958).

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I asked Mayor Celebrezze a question, as follows:

Mayor Celebrezze, what evidence do you and your colleagues have that you could use $600 million a year for 10 years?

Mayor Celebrezze replied:

One, of course, Senator CLARK, is the findings of the American Municipal Association in its survey and questionnaires which were sent out to each of the mayors of the communities as to what their needs would be. Based on that, we feel we need a $600 million program.

No. 2 is that the program as it is now constituted is one where we are losing instead of gaining ground, and not going fast enough.

I then asked the question:

Are you losing ground in Cleveland?

And Mayor Celebrezze replied:

We certainly are. We have 35,000 substandard living quarters in the city of Cleveland and at the rate we are going now we are losing ground, because of various reasons.

We have a new influx of people into our area who need low-cost housing. We are hit, as other major cities are hit, by major freeway improvements. We have one stretch of road in Cleveland, the Lakeland Freeway, which will run 3½ miles, and you have to tear down 800 two-family homes in good shape. Where do those people go?

I continued:

I am asking you, Where can you put them?

And Mayor Celebrezze said:

We do not have any place to put them unless we clear out some of the slum area and put in decent living quarters.

I turn now, Mr. President, to the testimony of a distinguished Republican mayor from the other side of the United States, Mayor Norris Poulson, of Los Angeles, the president of the United States Conference of Mayors.

Mr. President, I was happy indeed to welcome Mayor Poulson into the ranks of those interested in more urban renewal. I recall very well that before Mayor Poulson was elected in Los Angeles, while he was a member of the other body, he and I engaged in a debate before the American Municipal Association in the city of New Orleans, in which I supported public housing and urban renewal and he opposed it. But the mayor of Los Angeles, being a highly intelligent gentleman of great integrity, when he was elected chief executive of his city and saw the conditions, reversed his position and has now come over to our side.

Mr. President, I can assure Senators there is no more able advocate than a recent convert. Mayor Poulson said to the committee:

The survey which will be presented to you later in this week demonstrates the need for legislation authorizing a comprehensive long-term program with increased annual Federal participation. The record demonstrates that a program of Federal grants of $600 million annually for conservation, rehabilitation, and redevelopment could be prudently employed by local governments. We recommend that the committee and the Senate give such a program their approval. Experience over the past several years also has demonstrated the difficulties of 1- and 2-year authorizations. The very nature of urban renewal requires considerable time for community acceptance, planning and redevelopment. The program should be authorized for 10 years in advance. This would permit sound planning and intelligent local budgeting without the pressure to move ahead or lose the funds.

We urge that the ability of the local governments to intelligently and judiciously utilize the funds be the determining factor as to the amount to be made available. In this way constant progress can be made and attempts at administrative rationing would be unjustified. Experience since September 1958, when the Federal agency imposed a rationing formula in an attempt to make do with a very limited supply of funds, demonstrates that such arbitrary attempts to spread a small amount of money over the whole Nation does not promote sound urban renewal projects. Congress should make adequate funds available and bar administrative rationing.

At a later point, Mayor Poulson said:

Slum clearance and urban renewal are of great importance to the morale, loyalty, and prosperity necessary to support national efforts in times of crisis. To ignore or seriously cut down these activities would be like putting a golden roof on a house when the foundation has been attacked by termites.

I turn finally to the statement which appears on page 582 of the record, from the National Association of Housing and Redevelopment officials. This is the program resolution adopted at the annual business meeting of that fine organization on October 15, 1958. I quote from that statement:

Urban renewal: The program is again faced with a critical capital grant shortage. For the third time in less than 2 years, the amount of available capital grant authority, the lifeblood of the program, is only a fraction of what is needed by communities in order that they may schedule and undertake essential long-range renewal activities.

It is ironic that the continued existence of the urban-renewal program is threatened at a time when the Congress, the administration, and political, business, labor, and civic leaders throughout the Nation recognize the need for an urban-renewal program on a continuing basis. It is essential that our communities be assured of continuing availability of capital-grant authority at a level sufficient to meet their needs.

At a later point:

In order to meet these objectives, NAHRO advocates: (1) an increase in Federal capital grant obligational authority under title I of the Housing Act of 1949 in the amount of $600 million each year for the next 10 years; (2) an increase in the Federal share of net project cost for renewal projects from two-thirds to 80 percent.

Again, I am under no illusions as to the possibility of any such program being approved by the Senate this year. We need it. We ought to have it. It will be a great misfortune to our citizens and communities if we do not get it. However, I am enough of a realist to know that this program has no chance of success in the current almost obsessive preoccupation of the public generally with folklore about the state of the Federal budget.

This program would not affect the President's budget, but we cannot make the public believe it. It would not result in Federal expenditures for years, but we cannot make the public believe it.

So, because I am a realist in this regard, I now withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania is withdrawn.

Mr. CLARK. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated. It is designated "2–3–59—B."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the committee amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 305 in the committee amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 305. The first sentence of section 103(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended to read as follows: "The Administrator, on and after July 1, 1949, may, with the approval of the President, contract to make capital grants, with respect to projects assisted under this title, and to make grants pursuant to subsection (c) of this section, aggregating not to exceed $1,350,000,000, which limit shall be increased by $450,000,000 on the date of enactment of the Housing Act of 1959 and on July 1 in each of the years 1959 to 1961, both inclusive: Provided, That such limit, and any such authorized increase therein, may be increased, at any time or times, by additional amounts aggregating not more than $150,000,000 if such action is necessary to meet the needs of pending bona fide applications on file with the Administrator: Provided further, That the amount of capital grants contracted for under this title prior to July 1, 1962, shall not exceed an aggregate of $3,150,000,000."

Mr. CLARK. At a later time this afternoon, after a quorum call, I shall speak on this amendment. I hope it can be brought to a vote later today.

For the moment, I yield the floor.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I should like to commend the President for submitting, today, a legislative message on civil rights. In this fashion he joins the distinguished majority leader [Mr. JOHNSON] who introduced a bill on civil rights some weeks ago. He also joins the able and determined Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and other distinguished Members of the Senate who introduced legislation on this matter on January 29.

I have read the President's message on civil rights. At first glance, it appears to contain many provisions which are substantially the same as those to be found in the Johnson bill and in the Douglas bill.

The first provision of the President's proposal, for example, is modeled after title V of the Douglas bill. The second is derived from title IV of the Johnson bill. The third, too, derives from the Johnson bill, title III. The fourth is adapted from title IV of the Douglas bill.

The fifth and sixth provisions of the President's bill have no direct parallels in either the Johnson or the Douglas bills. But both are peripheral to the problem of civil rights as it confronts us in this session. The fifth provision, for example, is designed to take care of those children of military personnel who do not live on military reservations or other Federal property and, hence, in some areas may find their education temporarily interfered with because of difficulties in desegregation. I do not know how many children may be affected but it seems to me that even if there were but a handful, this provision is eminently desirable. I do not understand, therefore, why the President has asked for only temporary authorization. It seems to me such provision is essential as long as those children may require these special arrangements.

I am also at a loss to understand the need for the sixth provision of the President's proposal. The President already has the power to prevent nondiscrimination in unemployment under Government contracts. I presume and I hope that he has been exercising this power. Why he needs congressional sanction for something which he presumably is already doing, why he wants to substitute a statutory commission for an executive committee which is already functioning, I do not fathom. I hope that he has sounder reasons for this step than are apparent in his message. I can only assume that he has such reasons since I am sure that he would not want to throw into the political arena, once again, an aspect of the civil rights problem which to all intents and purposes has already been settled in a satisfactory fashion. To do that would hardly be in keeping with the general admonition which he has directed to us at the beginning of his statement when he says:

> The United States has a vital stake in striving wisely to achieve the goal of full equality under law for all people. On several occasions I have stated that progress toward this goal depends not on laws alone but on building a better understanding.

One might add to that admonition, that least of all does progress depend on a political doing over of what has already been done.

In any event, Mr. President, I welcome the President's supplement to the preliminary legislative work of the Senate on civil rights for this session. It will receive the same careful consideration as the Johnson bill and the Douglas bill by the democratic majority in the Senate.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I am very glad that our distinguished colleague and my friend finds that the President has been constructive in his proposal. I believe so, too. Although I think it should go further than it goes, I agree that it is a very constructive move.

I should like to ask the Senator whether he expects that a civil rights bill upon which we can act will be before us, in view of the traditional fact that it has been impossible to get one from the Judiciary Committee; also in view of the fact that when the bill did come up in 1957, it was motioned up under a very interesting set of circumstances, which may not be repeated. May we, therefore, know whether we have any expectation of having any civil rights bill before us upon which we can vote?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I can only speak personally, as the Senator from New York is aware, but it is my belief that we will have a civil rights bill before us at this session.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague for that very encouraging news. It is the most encouraging news we have had, including the three bills.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am delighted that the President, in his wisdom, saw fit to include the most pertinent and best parts of both the Johnson and Douglas bills in the proposal he has placed before us today.

Mr. JAVITS. I hope, too, if I may say so, that Congress will see fit to take some parts of what some of the rest of us will offer.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am sure they will all be considered.

HOUSING ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 57) to extend and amend laws relating to the provision and improvement of housing and the renewal of urban communities, and for other purposes.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, the omnibus housing bill before the Senate is, in my estimation, a modest approach to some pressing needs. It is, in fact, too modest, since it does barely more than scratch the surface of the problems.

At a time when the need for low-rent public housing is as great as ever, this bill would authorize but 35,000 additional units.

At a time when our cities are crying out for assistance in getting a new lease on life through urban renewal programs only $350 million a year is provided.

I do not mean to deprecate the housing bill now before us. It is in most respects a good bill as far as it goes.

Yet, modest as this bill is, the administration seeks to kill it on the grounds that it would do violence to the President's fictitiously balanced budget.

The administration raises the cry that it will seek to hold the line.

Well, I always thought the team that "held the line" was on the defensive, a strange situation for America to be in. But that apparently is the administration's position: on the defensive against progress and growth.

Such an attitude displays a startling lack of confidence in America's ability to meet the challenges of the 20th and 21st centuries.

In the past few months the boundaries of our United States grew to include the 49th State of Alaska. We are hopeful that this geographic growth will continue this year with the addition of Hawaii as the 50th State.

Our country, also, is experiencing a dramatic growth in population. In the past year America grew by nearly 3 million persons, and an even larger advance is expected in 1959.

These are convincing signs that America is a growing, living nation, a nation which anticipates that its tomorrows will be even greater than its yesterdays.

This has been the spirit of America from the day the first settlers set foot upon our shores.

The spirit of growth and greatness guided our pioneers as they carved a bigger America out of the wilderness.

They settled the West when the West meant Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan. But they kept going until they reached the Pacific, and even today America may well reach into the Pacific for its 50th State.

Yes, growth has been the tradition and the spirit of America.

Today, as we try to adjust to the heavy responsibilities of world leadership, as we reach out tentatively for the moon and the stars, as the atom and other fascinating technological advances hold out wonderful promises of things to come, we understand that America's growth must not halt.

But as we gaze with anticipation on these things, it comes as a great shock that something is wrong, very wrong, with this picture.

Simply stated, it is this: America's economic growth not only is falling miserably short of the needs of tomorrow's world, it is even failing to keep pace with today's.

The economic progress of our country is of paramount concern, as should be obvious to anyone.

It is of vital importance, of course, to our citizens who, after all, are the strength of America.

Economic progress, to them, means an increasing standard of living, employment opportunities, goods and services at reasonable cost, and finer educational facilities for their children.

In short, it means the promise that with hard work tomorrow can be better than today, and a reasonable assurance that the latter years of one's life can be lived with dignity and security.

In terms of America's relations with the rest of the world, economic growth also is a vital thing.

It is difficult to expect other nations to look to us as an example of a way of life that brings economic progress to the people when, in fact, we are barely stumbling forward.

How can we inspire other nations to look with favor on our system when indications are that the Soviet Union is outstripping us in economic as well as military progress?

The failure to recognize the urgent need for swift and continuing economic progress probably is the worst feature of the current administration's domestic policy.

It is nowhere more evident than in the President's proposed budget, a budget that is a mighty monument to the status quo.

In today's world there can be no such thing as the status quo.

We must move either forward or backward. No other nation is going to wait for us to rationalize with us that we can get something called progress at cut-rate prices.

At the present time administration spokesmen are waving around fancy graphs and business indicators to illustrate how well the United States has come out of the 1958 recession.

I find this especially interesting in view of the fact that a year ago, and on through the campaign of November 1958, the administration refused to acknowledge there was a recession.

Just a year ago I rose on this Senate floor to call attention to the then-blossoming recession and to urge that swift and forthright steps be taken to head it off.

At that time, more than 3½ million Americans were unemployed, and their ranks were swelling rapidly.

As my colleagues may recall, I called specific attention to the Employment Act of 1946 which states in part:

> It is the continuing policy and responsibility of the Federal Government to use all practicable means * * * to coordinate and utilize all its plans, functions and resources for the purpose of creating and maintaining * * * conditions under which there will be afforded useful employment opportunities * * * for those able, willing and seeking to work, and to promote maximum employment, production and purchasing power.

It was my thought then, and it still is, that the Employment Act of 1946 was on the statute books to be implemented and utilized.

I suggested 11 steps which I believed the administration and the Congress should take to head off the recession that, in February 1958, was growing by leaps and bounds.

While Congress did come to grips with the recession through the adoption of such legislation as social security improvements, emergency unemployment compensation, and aid to small business, the administration, regretfully, sat on its hands.

Or even worse, it actively fought other measures, such as the area redevelopment bill, the community facilities bill, and a really meaningful unemployment insurance measure.

Today, a year later when the recession is held up as only a slightly disturbing dream which has since disappeared, there are still well over 4 million persons unemployed, and about 1 million others in part-time employment.

And there are no prospects, in the immediate future at least, that this figure will grow smaller.

It may well become larger, and a highly disturbing part of it is that a good many thousands of the unemployed persons have had their jobs abolished through automation and other devices.

The problem facing America is not just how to put an end to the 1958 recession.

The problem, indeed the challenge, facing America is how to prevent recessions from occurring in the future, how to bring about continued growth in our national prosperity.

The actual growth of America's prosperity in recent years, as measured by the gross national product, is a very disturbing matter.

The President plans to carry his battle for his so-called balanced budget to the people, hoping to enlist their aid in preserving the status quo.

But while he is doing that, I hope he explains to our citizens just why it is that the rate of economic growth of America has slipped badly under his fiscal policies.

I think that is the kind of information the people should have, if he can provide it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNAMARA. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Is the Senator aware of the fact that the rate of our economic growth in the last year was really about the same as the increase in population?

Mr. McNAMARA. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. Actually, when the administration speaks of a growing or an expanding economy, it is something like a squirrel running on a treadmill. We are producing just enough food and just enough other goods to keep up with the increase in population. The net effect is a standstill.

Mr. McNAMARA. I certainly agree with the Senator.

Mr. LONG. We are standing still in effect, running in the same place. We are running, but we are not getting anywhere.

Mr. McNAMARA. The Senator is correct. That is the point I am developing.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNAMARA. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. Is it not true that production in the United States at the moment has created surpluses? Have we not tremendous farm surpluses and surpluses of almost all other conceivable articles? The automobile factories in the Senator's own hometown are capable of producing more automobiles than can be sold.

Does the Senator know of any shortage of production in the United States, production of things which the people need or want, but cannot buy because they are not made or because too few are available?

Mr. McNAMARA. I know of no such instances. I think the charge that we must slow down our economy so that we will not have inflation is totally repudiated by what the Senator has just said.

Mr. LONG. The reason the people do not buy is that they do not have the money; and the administration is trying to guarantee that they will not have the money.

Mr. McNAMARA. I certainly agree with the Senator from Louisiana.

During the years 1947 to 1953, the economic growth of this country, even reflecting current prices, averaged 5 percent a year.

But, since the end of the Korean war to the present, the annual economic growth has averaged well under 2 percent.

I submit that these figures tell more eloquently than anything else just what has been happening to America's economy and provide a very somber warning for the future.

During the very years when the population had grown an astounding 15 million, when vast new technological advances came into being, the economic progress of our country dropped drastically.

The economy, in the most simple terms, is being strangled.

It is being choked to death by men of little vision and confidence, men devoid of ideas and of the understanding that America must grow to survive.

The economy is being strangled by those who seem to think that prosperity is a selective sort of thing, like nobility, to which not simply everyone can aspire.

Helping to choke America's economic growth is something called the tight-money policy which is offered in the guise of a weapon against inflation, but which has the main effect of raising interest rates to the general public.

This policy hurts no one except the bulk of the public. During last year's recession while millions were unemployed, cash dividends of corporations were less than 1 percent below the record high total of 1957.

During the height of the recession the tight-money choker seemed to be slackened a bit, presumably to give a dying economy a little air.

But hardly had there been one sign of recovery than it was tightened up again.

While the President is trying to explain to the public why the annual economic growth has averaged less than 2 percent, I wish he also would explain about his administration's love of high interest rates.

The Treasury Department now, for example, is paying 4 percent interest on bonds due in 1980, the highest interest rate the Government has paid since the 1920's.

Out of the President's proposed $77 billion budget, more than 10 percent, or better than $8 billion, would be paid in interest on the national debt.

This $8 billion would go to those who become fat off the administration's tight-money policy, yet who produce nothing for the economy and perform no service of any consequence.

Perhaps the President could also explain why it is that his policies have not only held back the Nation's necessary economic growth, but at the same time somehow costing the public more for this dubious privilege.

I refer to this increase in the interest charges and to the fact that to really balance his proposed budget would mean an increase in the gasoline tax and the cost of mailing a letter.

Further, we are struck by the curious situation where the cost of living has been steadily climbing since 1953 and reached a record high in the middle of the worst postwar recession.

In his economic report, the President attempted to place the blame on the working people, who won deserved wage increases, rather than on unreasonable price increases.

In his next press conference, however, he backed off a bit from this unsupported position.

In any event, these are the kinds of questions the people are asking, and the administration should answer them truthfully before there is any defense of an undernourished economic program.

It is said that the President and his administration are concerned, and considerably surprised, because the plea for economy seems to have fallen on deaf ears with the public.

I think there is nothing surprising about this. In fact, I consider it a tribute to the high level of intelligence of the public in seeing the many deficiencies of the proposed budget.

The idea that a national budget can be brought into a semblance of paper balance is no comfort to more than 4 million persons who are unemployed.

The idea of producing balance at the price of paying more for a gallon of gasoline or mailing a letter simply makes no sense to the general public.

There is an interesting dissection of this budget that holds that about 76 cents of each tax dollar goes primarily to pay for past or future wars; that is, for defense, interest, and veterans' benefits.

This leaves only 24 cents for other purposes, and of this about one-third is for the farm program, a tremendously expensive operation which the administration somehow has succeeded in making unworkable.

It is difficult to understand why, with the expenditure of about $8 billion to conduct the national farm policy, we do not have the best, most efficient farming system in existence.

Perhaps that is another question the President can explain when he takes his budget problems to the public.

What I have tried to outline in these remarks is why the Congress, more than ever, must bear the burden of providing for the Nation's economic growth, why we must pass such measures as the housing bill.

It has been demonstrated over and over again that the administration feels little compulsion to insure the economic advancement of the United States.

(At this point Mr. MCNAMARA yielded to Mr. SPARKMAN for a unanimous-consent request. Mr. SPARKMAN'S remarks appear at the end of Mr. MCNAMARA'S speech.)

Mr. MCNAMARA. Mr. President, the main goal seems to have been to stubbornly fight off any new idea that might somehow germinate in progress for America.

In this, at least, the current administration can be said to be extremely successful.

But, I am of an optimistic sort.

I have confidence that despite the obstacles placed in our way, despite the uninspired and unimaginative conduct of the executive branch, we as a Congress can still lead our country to greatness.

A year ago when I attempted to raise an alarm over the pending recession, I listed 11 points that I believe the Congress should follow to attack the recession and to prevent another.

Many of these points remain today, not completely fulfilled, but still as necessary as ever.

These goals are not just antirecession measures. They must be looked upon, instead, as the means to restore the annual economic growth, growth that America must have if we are to continue to lead the world.

I maintain today, as I did a year ago, that despite the increasing cost of defense and general government, the lower and middle income groups are entitled to a downward tax revision.

The resulting loss of tax income could be compensated for, I am convinced, by a forthright move to close the many tax loopholes in the present law, such as the oil and gas depletion allowance and the insurance company windfalls.

Last year the Congress took significant strides toward assisting the Nation's independent businessmen through some tax relief and the Small Business Investment Act.

But further attention is needed to halt the alarming increase in independent business failures, which rose to 55.9 per 10,000 in 1958.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. MCNAMARA. I am happy to yield to my colleague from Louisana.

Mr. LONG. I should like to direct the attention of the Senator from Michigan to information which I believe will shortly be forthcoming; I refer to information on the operation of American oil companies in the Near East. I believe it will be found that that information will be similar to that about American oil companies doing business in Venezuela and other foreign countries, and bringing their oil into the United States. I think it would be found that that is where the big profits are made.

I believe it will also be found that to reduce the depletion allowance will not aid in this connection but, rather, that attention will have to be directed to the foreign tax credit, which has been manipulated by such companies in such a way that companies with a depletion allowance of 27½ percent have been able to avoid hundreds of millions of dollars of taxes, because of the peculiar way they have been able to take full advantage of the so-called foreign tax credit.

Mr. MCNAMARA. I wish to say to my friend, the Senator from Louisiana, that I am perfectly familiar with the fact that this problem is a very complex one; and I shall be glad to listen with as open a mind as possible to the arguments which he will advance at the time when that problem is brought before us.

Mr. President, the need for classrooms has not diminished. In fact, in view of the population growth and the rate at which old schools are becoming obsolescent, the need is even greater.

Bills to provide Federal assistance to the States for school construction are now before our Labor and Public Welfare Committee, which began hearings this week.

One of these bills is my own; I refer to Senate bill 8, which would provide $2 billion in Federal funds, over a 2-year period, to help the States build classrooms. This year, let us hope, the administration will stop fighting this vitally necessary program, and will lend its support to enactment. We need only point out that America's future cannot be measured in economic progress alone. It also must be measured in terms of the ability to educate our children.

Last year, we passed the area redevelopment bill, only to have it meet with a Presidential veto. That bill, in the form of Senate bill 722, is with us again; and I expect that this time it will become law—over a veto if necessary.

The housing and airport programs upon which the Congress will shortly act are of great necessity in stimulating a lagging economy while at the same time providing lasting benefits.

The temporary unemployment compensation bill of last year, while serving its emergency role of assisting the jobless who had exhausted regular benefits, had the net result of putting our sorely pressed States deeper in a financial hole. It is incumbent upon this Congress, I believe, to establish long-needed Federal standards of unemployment insurance.

Another much-needed step, in view of both immediate and long-range benefits, is the extension of the minimum wage provisions and an increase of the wage itself. A hike in the hourly minimum wage to $1.25 an hour is urgently needed, as is the extension of Fair Labor Standards Act protection to millions of our citizens.

Our communities are crying out for assistance to clear slums, to build sewers and water systems.

These are not isolated matters. These have become national problems. They call for enactment of a greatly expanded urban renewal program and of a community facilities bill with a low-interest-rate loan program.

There are other areas where action is needed, if not actually overdue. However, these would require action by the administration; and it is doubtful that anything progressive can be anticipated. I refer specifically to the fiscal policy of the Nation, which seems to be set by the Budget Bureau and the Federal Reserve Board, using the occupant of the White House only as a mouthpiece.

The system of placement of defense contracts should be given a long-overdue revision, in view of the tremendous amounts that are spent in this field each year. With more than half our national budget earmarked for defense, it is incumbent upon the Government to exercise something more than cursory control over the spending of these billions.

I have mentioned here, very briefly, several areas where I feel action is desperately needed. What I have mentioned is not some irresponsible spending program, as the administration would like the public to believe. It is, instead, a minimum program that our country must, I believe, follow if it is to survive as something more than a second-rate country economically.

Many of these programs do cost dollars. But these are dollars, that, cast upon the economy, will return to us manyfold, in terms of a greater prosperity for everyone.

If we want our country to continue annual economic progress of less than 2 percent, while Russia exceeds 7 or 8 percent, we can continue on the present course.

If we want to ignore the principles and intent of the Employment Act of 1946, and have several million persons more or less permanently unemployed, we can take no action.

But if America wants to meet the future confidently and squarely, armed and forewarned of its obligations, then it will proceed to take action.

I am confident that this is the course we will take.

I thank the Senate.

During the delivery of Mr. MCNAMARA'S speech,

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield so that I may propose a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. McNAMARA. I am happy to yield with the understanding that the interruption will appear at the end of my remarks, and that I will not lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the remarks of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], who, I understand, will speak after the Senator from Michigan has concluded, further debate on the pending amendment be limited to 30 minutes for the proponents of the amendment and 30 minutes for the majority leader or any Senator designated by him.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I had intended to speak. I am on the list following the Senator from Michigan, but I prefer to speak to the amendment. I should like to have a maximum of 5 minutes in which to speak in support of the Clark amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is agreeable.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Does the Senator's proposal relate to the amendment now pending at the desk?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Thirty minutes on each side is agreeable.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I thank the Senator from Michigan for yielding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am opposed to the public housing and urban renewal provisions of this bill.

I am informed that by the end of fiscal year 1960, more than 475,000 federally aided public housing units will be occupied by more than 2 million people; and, in addition, 110,000 units which now are authorized will be under contract, but not occupied.

It is estimated by the public housing authority that there is an annual turnover of 30 percent of the tenants in public housing. This means, Mr. President, that, from units built and to be built without any additional legislation, there will be available approximately 180,000 units for occupancy by new tenants annually.

A study of this bill, which I admit is somewhat difficult under the circumstances under which we consider it today, will reveal that no longer is it the purpose of this program to provide low-rent housing for persons who cannot afford adequate housing built with funds from private sources. The original purpose of the bill has long since lapsed into oblivion. I am informed that the Public Housing Administration authorizes the construction of units at a maximum cost of up to $17,000 a unit. Although income requirements for tenancy in public housing have been most loosely administered in the past, this bill abolishes all pretense at providing housing solely for low-income tenants. It repeals the requirement for eviction of overincome tenants. It gives the housing authorities complete discretion in setting rents and income.

Mr. President, the continued extensions and degenerations of the public housing activities of the U.S. Government cause me to wonder whether we are adhering in principle to article VI of the Constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, which reads as follows:

ART. 6. The land, its mineral wealth, waters, forests, mills, factories, mines, rail, water and air transport, banks, communications, large state-organized agricultural enterprises (state farms, machine and tractor stations and the like), as well as municipal enterprises and the bulk of the dwelling houses in the cities and industrial localities, are state property, that is, belong to the whole people.

I just read a quotation from article 6 of the Communist Constitution.

Mr. President, our humanitarian instinct comprises one of our strongest national traits. I am motivated by as strong a humanitarian instinct as anyone in our country. I have real concern for those who are in dire economic circumstances and without decent and suitable living quarters. However, it is our very humanitarianism, admirable and worthy though it be, on which the complacency of the American people is founded. By using a subtle, sometimes even subliminal approach, our enemies have enlisted our unthinking support of causes apparently for the promotion of human rights, but which, when carefully examined, reveal an underlying advancement of collectivism, which is the gravest threat to our country today. We find ourselves even more vulnerable to plans for promoting the economic welfare of all, or a particular portion, of our people, at the instance of government. We are inclined to direct our exclusive attention to the purportedly noble purpose of the plan, but to ignore the threatened jeopardy to our individual liberty and the impracticality of utilizing the tool of government, in lieu of personal and private initiative.

No program, no decision, no action, proposed to be undertaken by the Federal Government, should be free from the most careful scrutiny and logical judgment of each and every American citizen. Individual liberty and practicality must be weighed against not only the purported material benefit, but also against the practically probable benefits. Nothing should be accepted at face value, for only by laying aside emotional impulses and submitting each matter to a logical and objective analysis, can we avoid the pitfalls of collectivism.

After careful personal analysis of the public housing provisions of S. 57, I can only see in this proposal a further involvement of our Government into private enterprise activities, an increased national debt, and another smashing victory for the insidious forces of socialism. In fact, Mr. President, the public housing program further proves the point that socialism is an inefficient and impractical philosophy. I can see no excuse for its continuation.

Private enterprise has also been tested in this country. Unlike socialism, however, it has proved itself by giving to our country a standard of living which, at its lowest ebb, is far superior to any other known to the world. Private enterprise can do and is doing the housing job at no cost to the taxpayer. I do not believe that the Government should be in the housing business or any other business unless two conditions are fully met. First, the project must be something that is vitally needed. As I have pointed out, almost 600,000 units will be in existence without any further legislation on the subject, and this will accommodate approximately 180,000 family units annually. The second condition for the Government to get into business is that private enterprise is not willing to do the job. In this instance private enterprise is doing the job. We are undergoing at present a private housing boom. There is no slack in the building program. One but needs to examine the classified ads under real estate in any newspaper to see that, not only new housing is available, but that there is also a surplus of adequate existing housing available at low cost.

The question of cost to the taxpayer is also extremely pertinent on this issue. There is involved in this bill a revival of about 10,000 units for which authority expired in June of 1958, an extension of the 35,000 units authorized for the current fiscal year until June of 1961, and an additional increment of 35,000 new units which will be open until July 1, 1963. This is an unjustifiable splurge on an unworkable program. The cost of the subsidies for these units will be astronomical. It is an insult to the already overburdened American taxpayer, and adds further to the debt obligations which his children will bear for years to come.

Now, Mr. President, as to urban renewal, there are so many bad features of this program that they almost defy enumeration. It is unconscionable in its entirety. There are several features, however, which are even more objectionable than the usual undesirables included in this program. For instance, this bill would repeal the existing $1 billion ceiling on borrowings from the Treasury and would substitute no ceiling whatsoever. It raises from 10 to 20 percent of the total capital grants that may be used for nonresidential developments. It increases the Federal proportion by diminishing the local share through application against the one-third local share of public works completed as much as 5 years prior to the authorization of the contract by the Housing Administrator.

Considering the fact that $1,350 million is already authorized for urban renewal grants, the authorization of $2,100 million additional in new grants reflects, to say the least, a total unconcern for the financial condition of the United States Government and its citizen taxpayers.

Mr. President, I intend to vote against this bill; it should be defeated.

PROPOSED CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 75)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the Congress of the United States:

Two principles basic to our system of government are that the rule of law is supreme, and that every individual regardless of his race, religion, or national origin is entitled to the equal protection of the laws. We must continue to seek every practicable means for reinforcing these principles and making them a reality for all.

The United States has a vital stake in striving wisely to achieve the goal of full equality under law for all people. On several occasions I have stated that progress toward this goal depends not on laws alone but on building a better understanding. It is thus important to remember that any further legislation in this field must be clearly designed to continue the substantial progress that has taken place in the past few years. The recommendations for legislation which I am making have been weighed and formulated with this in mind.

First. I recommend legislation to strengthen the law dealing with obstructions of justice so as to provide expressly that the use of force or threats of force to obstruct court orders in school desegregation cases shall be a Federal offense.

There have been instances where extremists have attempted by mob violence and other concerted threats of violence to obstruct the accomplishment of the objectives in school decrees. There is a serious question whether the present obstruction of justice statute reaches such acts of obstruction which occur after the completion of the court proceedings. Nor is the contempt power a satisfactory enforcement weapon to deal with persons who seek to obstruct court decrees by such means.

The legislation that I am recommending would correct a deficiency in the present law and would be a valuable enforcement power on which the Government could rely to deter mob violence and such other acts of violence or threats which seek to obstruct court decrees in desegregation cases.

Second. I recommend legislation to confer additional investigative authority on the FBI in the case of crimes involving the destruction or attempted destruction of schools or churches, by making flight from one State to another to avoid detention or prosecution for such a crime a Federal offense.

All decent, self-respecting persons deplore the recent incidents of bombings of schools and places of worship. While State authorities have been diligent in their execution of local laws dealing with these crimes, a basis for supplementary action by the Federal Government is needed.

Such recommendation when enacted would make it clear that the FBI has full authority to assist in investigations of crimes involving bombings of schools and churches. At the same time, the legislation would preserve the primary responsibility for law enforcement in local law enforcement agencies for crimes committed against local property.

Third. I recommend legislation to give the Attorney General power to inspect Federal election records, and to require that such records be preserved for a reasonable period of time so as to permit such inspection.

The right to vote, the keystone of democratic self-government, must be available to all qualified citizens without discrimination. Until the enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1957, the Government could protect this right only through criminal prosecutions instituted after the right had been infringed. The 1957 act attempted to remedy this deficiency by authorizing the Attorney General to institute civil proceedings to prevent such infringements before they occurred.

A serious obstacle has developed which minimizes the effectiveness of this legislation. Access to registration records is essential to determine whether the denial of the franchise was in furtherance of a pattern of racial discrimination. But during preliminary investigations of complaints the Department of Justice, unlike the Civil Rights Commission, has no authority to require the production of election records in a civil proceeding. State or local authorities, in some instances, have refused to permit the inspection of their election records in the course of investigations. Supplemental legislation, therefore, is needed.

Fourth. I recommend legislation to provide a temporary program of financial and technical aid to State and local agencies to assist them in making the necessary adjustments required by school desegregation decisions.

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare should be authorized to assist and cooperate with those States which have previously required or permitted racially segregated public schools, and which must now develop programs of desegregation. Such assistance should consist of sharing the burdens of transition through grants-in-aid to help meet additional costs directly occasioned by desegregation programs, and also of making technical information and assistance available to State and local educational agencies in preparing and implementing desegregation programs.

I also recommend that the Commissioner of Education be specifically authorized, at the request of the State or local agencies, to provide technical assistance in the development of desegregation programs and to initiate or participate in conferences called to help resolve educational problems arising as a result of efforts to desegregate.

Fifth. I recommend legislation to authorize, on a temporary basis, provision for the education of children of members of the Armed Forces when State-administered public schools have been closed because of desegregation decisions or orders.

The Federal Government has a particular responsibility for the children of military personnel in federally affected areas, since armed services personnel are located there under military orders rather than of their own free choice. Under the present law, the Commissioner of Education may provide for the education of children of military personnel only in the case of those who live on military reservations or other Federal property. The legislation I am recommending would remove this limitation.

Sixth. I recommend that Congress give consideration to the establishing of a statutory Commission on Equal Job Opportunity Under Government Contracts.

Nondiscrimination in employment under Government contracts is required by Executive orders. Through education, mediation, and persuasion, the existing Committee on Government Contracts has sought to give effect not only to this contractual obligation, but to the policy of equal job opportunities generally. While the program has been widely accepted by Government agencies, employers, and unions, and significant progress has been made, full implementation of the policy would be materially advanced by the creation of a statutory Commission.

Seventh. I recommend legislation to extend the life of the Civil Rights Commission for an additional 2 years. While the Commission should make an interim report this year within the time originally fixed by law for the making of its final report, because of the delay in getting the Commission appointed and staffed, an additional 2 years should be provided for the completion of its task and the making of its final report.

I urge the prompt consideration of these seven proposals.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 5, 1959.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 2) continuing the Joint Committee on Washington Metropolitan Problems.

The message informed the Senate that, pursuant to the provisions of section 194, title 4, United States Code, the Speaker had appointed the following Members on the part of the House to serve as members of the Board of Visitors to the U.S. Coast Guard Academy: Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER of California; Mr. LENNON, of North Carolina; and Mr. MAILLIARD, of California.

HOUSING ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 57) to extend and amend laws relating to the provision and improvement of housing and the renewal of urban communities, and for other purposes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announces that under the order previously approved debate on the pending amendment will be limited to 30 minutes under the control of the author of the amendment and 30 minutes under the control of the majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I understand the Senator desires a yea and nay vote. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I should like to use 1 minute of the time given to our side to yield to the Senator from North Dakota, so that he may offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, I call up my amendment 2–4–59—C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that notwithstanding the fact that another amendment is pending, the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota may be considered. I think we can dispose of it within 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to redesignate subsections (b), (c), and (d) of section 701 of the bill as subsections (c), (d), and (e), respectively, and insert after subsection (a) of such section a new subsection as follows:

(b) Clause (2) of section 302(b) of such Act is amended by inserting before the semicolon at the end of such clause a comma and the following: "except that a mortgage may be purchased by the Association if it is offered by a bank which is a wholly owned State instrumentality".

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, we have no objection on this side to the amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We have no objection, Mr. President. I have explained to the Senator from North Dakota that we will take the amendment to conference. In the meantime we will examine it a little more closely. I think it is a good provision. As I understand the situation, the amendment relates to a wholly State-owned bank in North Dakota which is able, willing, and desirous of making money available for the building of an old folks' home or a nursing home.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The Senator is correct. This is practically the only bank in the State which is interested in and capable of handling the matter. I think North Dakota is the only State with a wholly owned State bank.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I understand that to be true. We have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The Senator from Pennsylvania has 30 minutes remaining, and the majority leader has 29 minutes remaining.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I support the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I had the honor to support the amendment in the committee and I wish to support it on the floor.

Mr. President, this is a very serious matter involving a very large responsibility in terms of the economy of the United States. I hope very much it will be considered as seriously as some of the rest of us consider proposed irrigation legislation, proposed public dams, and farm problems, which are of very great interest to other sections of the country.

Mr. President, it is not recognized widely enough that today there are 100 million people living in United States cities—100 million people—and that the farm population has diminished in the last two decades by about 50 percent.

Mr. President, urban renewal is absolutely indispensable to the cities. If there is nothing else I say today, let that be clear: Urban renewal is absolutely indispensable to the cities.

This is true not only of large cities, but of small cities as well. It is the fact that because we failed to pass a housing bill last year, and we had only $154 million available for the urban renewal program, out of the Budget Bureau's funds and the President's funds, we have had a real national emergency, holding up the entire urban renewal program, with rationing imposed on cities, restraining them from going forward with the programs which were in effect, and restraining them from proposing new programs.

The $450 million annually provided by the Clark amendment for the next 4 years would give us a smaller authorization, even, than that in the bill of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN]. However, it would have the advantage of giving it to us when we need it in the big cities. It must be compared with the budget request for $4,500 million for farm price supports, which directly benefit 11 percent of our population living on the farms, as contrasted with this request, which does not mean any money out of our pockets, essentially, considering the values it creates, and considering the fact that it is for the benefit of the majority of the American people who live in the cities.

I again emphasize that this is not strictly a big city operation. One-third of all the projects now under way are located in cities with populations of less than 25,000. It is these relative newcomers to the program which were the hardest hit by failure to authorize new grant funds for urban renewal during the last session.

Applications are now beginning to flow in, and unless we abolish the rationing system which has been established, which blocks the money and does not allow it to be used, because it is assumed that every city will ask for its allocation, when some cities do not, the result will be denials to other cities which have already used up their allocations, and find that they are far short of what is needed for established urban renewal projects.

In the case of Buffalo, N.Y., applications for a total of $18,200,000 were filed, in reliance on established policies, but the rationing formula, attributable to the fact that Congress had not authorized the necessary funds, limited that city to $2½ million, forcing the shelving of one project and cutting another by two-thirds.

The Banking and Currency Committee has declared itself against this rationing program, and has said that the best interests of the urban renewal program will be served by returning to the practice of issuing capital grant reservations on a first-come-first-served basis. There would be no danger of the continuation of this unfair and thwarting rationing policy if Congress were to authorize sufficient urban renewal funds at this time.

I am convinced that we must have the $450 million provision which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] has proposed. This is the essence of all the evidence on this subject, from the cities, from the American Municipal Association, from mayors, and from everyone else who is really in a position to know.

I believe this final point must be made very clear: It is not often that the people of the big cities of the United States and of the small cities come to the Congress for help which is directly for their benefit, in terms of the living conditions in their own home communities. Anyone who has surveyed large and small American cities must agree that the faces of our great cities are being changed by urban renewal programs. This is the most revolutionary change which has come about on the faces of American cities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute additional to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague.

It should be our privilege to help the great cities to forward this work further. Let us take an example in my own State. If we authorize the program in the Clark amendment, New York will receive $225 million in new moneys for urban renewal, through the middle of 1963. That would enable us to add to the $225 million $105 million of our own. However, the total end result, in terms of production of wealth and increased assets to the taxpayers is estimated to be not less than 10 times that amount. In other words, in terms of added values, not only in living and well being, but in added tangible values, the amount would be $3 billion.

I cannot think of a program which should appeal more to the conscience of the Congress than this one.

Finally, on the subject of inflation, this program makes our country richer. It is not what we owe; it is what we have against what we owe that counts in terms of the inflationary situation.

I hope very much that some recognition can be given to the problems of our American cities when we are recognizing everyone else's problems all the time—the problems on the farm and in rural areas. We are spending great sums of money on those programs.

I hope the pending amendment will be voted favorably.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE].

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Clark amendment is a moderate compromise. The proposal in the bill is totally inadequate. It is inadequate because it provides that for the next 6 years the Federal Government will maintain the same level of urban renewal that it has maintained in the past. The Clark amendment would modestly increase urban renewal appropriations already authorized by the Federal Government. I say it is moderate not merely on the basis of my own judgment, but on the basis of the judgment of a number of very prominent Americans.

I hold in my hand a report entitled "The Challenge to America: Its Economic and Social Aspects," being the Rockefeller Report on the U.S. economy. This group was headed by the present Governor of New York, Nelson Rockefeller. It included among its distinguished members Arthur F. Burns, former Economic Adviser to President Eisenhower; Gen. Lucius D. Clay, chairman of the board of the Continental Can Co., Inc.; John Cowles, president of the Minneapolis Star and Tribune; Devereux C. Josephs, chairman of the board of the New York Life Insurance Co.; Henry R. Luce, editor in chief of Time, Life, and Fortune magazines, and a number of other prominent, outstanding, and distinguished Americans. In their judgment, we should go far faster in urban renewal even than the Senator from Pennsylvania is proposing today.

If we are accused of being spenders because we advocate the Clark program, I tremble to think what adjectives would be applied to Henry Luce, John Cowles, Nelson Rockefeller, and the other gentlemen who were responsible for a report which advocates from 4 to 10 times as much as does Clark as I shall show. I now quote from page 69 of the Rockefeller report:

> Such a program would provide funds to meet needs in the water supply field and to increase Government expenditures for urban renewal from about $700 million last year to $4 billion in 1967.

These urban renewal funds are both local and Federal. They have been divided, in total effect, about 50–50 which would mean an increase from $350 million to $2 billion. The Rockefeller group therefore is proposing, and get this, an increase in urban renewal funds of the Federal Government from $350 million, not to the $450 million proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, but $2 billion. That is what they say is the minimum increase we should have by 1967.

I challenge any Senator to show how we could possibly get the $2 billion of Federal contributions by 1967, if we were to follow the proposal in the bill. We shall even fall short and far short if we follow the conservative, modest amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania. The recommendations of the Rockefeller report show that these prominent Americans felt that urban renewal is so important to this country that there should be recommended an increase in urban renewal far sharper than any other increase of Federal investments or expenditures. The Rockefeller group recommends an increase from 4 to 10 times the present level of urban renewal.

That is on page 68 of the report. They point out that if the economy of our country is to grow and expand, it is essential that the Federal Government support the economic growth by providing needed urban redevelopment. As a matter of fact, here is one of the very rare opportunities that we in the Senate will have to vote to promote economic growth in this Nation. This is why the vote on the Clark amendment is a very crucial vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS].

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, the cities of this country, when they come to a legislative body, always operate under a disadvantage; namely, that their representation in the legislative body is not as great as their proportion of population. That is true virtually of every State legislature in the country, and it is true of the Senate of the United States.

Nevertheless, those who know our cities are aware of the fact that not only are the cities rotting away at the center, but that many of the middle-aged neighborhoods are rotting away at the same time. If the cities are to be saved, we shall have to have a series of major surgical operations. The urban renewal principle provides a means whereby this can be done. The Clark proposal is more satisfactory than the committee bill in that it not only provides $450 million a year, instead of $350 million a year, but it also provides for an automatic escalator up to $600 million a year if the volume of the bona fide city applications justifies it. I do not believe we can depend on any power the President has to increase the figure about $350 million in any year, because he has shown again and again that he does not intend to use any discretionary power which he may have.

In brief, Mr. President, the Clark amendment only authorizes $1,800 million in 4 years, as compared to $2,100 million in 6 years, as authorized by the committee bill. The total obligations which we are committing ourselves to now will be less, even though the annual rate of expenditure will be greater.

The population of our country is moving cityward, and the cities are in great financial difficulties. Their expenses are increasing. Their revenues are not keeping pace. They are ready to meet their one-third of the costs, but they do need financial aid from the Federal Government, to which their citizens contribute in abundant measure through the taxes which they pay.

I hope very much that the Clark amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I shall take no more than a minute to call to the attention of all Senators an editorial which appears in today's Washington Post entitled "What Is a Local Need?"

I shall not take time to read it, but it is a comment upon the President's news conference of yesterday, when he took some exception to the airport bill and to the housing bill.

The editorial very wisely points out that we have been working on a very reasonable housing bill, and that certainly it ought to be considered in the light of its need in the country, rather than to be dismissed in the manner in which the President dismissed it.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT'S A LOCAL NEED?

The President's broken-record sermonizing against housing and other legislation that might increase spending next year by perhaps one-sixth to one-third of 1 percent is really outrageous. It is intellectually fuzzy to suggest, as Mr. Eisenhower and other Republican leaders are suggesting, that these measures are the first test of a balanced budget policy. There are a dozen largely uncontrollable variables in the President's budget which are far more likely to unbalance it—and by far more. The greater cause for outrage, however, is the seemingly grand unconcern in high places with the substance of this vital legislation.

The Senate housing bill, for example, was not put forward to unbalance the budget. It was developed as a really quite conservative and cautious response to the far greater needs of the American people for decent housing and livable cities. The airport bill, also attacked by the President on extremely tenuous and narrow grounds, was designed to meet similar urgent needs—including the safety that more airports would provide.

Let the localities pay for local benefits, the President blithely replies. Well, they haven't the taxing power. But even so, has not the Federal Government for a century and three quarters been providing for collections of local needs that add up to a national interest? Would the President tax Montgomery County alone for the Nike-Hercules base north of Rockville? It serves a local need—by Mr. Eisenhower's strained definition.

Although the President's suggestion that higher spending programs should include higher taxes leaves out of account the prospect of a continuing substantial slack in the economy, it does have some long-term merit. But he ought to be made consistent. If his first concern is with a balanced budget, and if he will not directly challenge the need for bigger housing and airport programs (however financed), Mr. Eisenhower himself is obliged to consider making tax increase proposals. Yet Budget Director Stans has said that the 1960 budget was prepared without any thought of raising taxes—whatever the demonstrable needs of the Nation. If the Republicans mean to talk like this steadily until the 1960 elections it is going to get awfully tiresome. They ought to get down to cases.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum, with the time required for the quorum call not being charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, how much time have I remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania has 16 minutes remaining.

Mr. CLARK. I yield myself 3 minutes.

The purpose of the pending amendment is to increase the urban renewal authorization on an annual basis from $350 million to $450 million, and to decrease the total urban renewal authorization from the $2.1 billion in the committee bill to $1.8 billion, or a decrease of $300 million.

The amendment would permit the amount of grant authorizations in any one year to be increased by $150 million whenever there should be bona fide applications for grant reservations pending with the Urban Renewal Administration in excess of the $450 million.

The net result of this proposal is to call for a grant authorization at the rate of $450 million for 4 years, or a total of $1,800 million. But if there were enough bona fide applications pending, the rate could go up to $600 million a year; and, accordingly, the entire grant authorization could be spent in 3 years, instead of 4. This must be contrasted with the provisions in the Sparkman bill, which call for $350 million a year for 6 years, or a total of $2,100 million, which is $300 million more than is provided in my amendment.

The proposal of the Senator from Alabama also calls for acceleration at the rate of $150 million a year, but only at the discretion of the President. I think we all know that the President is not prepared to grant that additional authorization; indeed, he is opposed to the level at which the urban renewal program is fixed in the bill which the distinguished Senator from Alabama is guiding through the Senate.

The importance of this is that under the Sparkman bill there will be a definite lack of adequate authorization authority by the end of the fiscal year 1960.

In the minority views, on page 80 of the committee report, is a table from which Senators can see that with the present backlog and with new applications being made at the rate of $40 million a month, there will be at the end of the fiscal year 1960 applications for grant reservations totaling $1,124 million; whereas, the Sparkman bill would provide authorizations for only $700 million.

So the question is clearly posed to the Senate: Do we want to have rationing of urban renewal, or do we want to finish the job as it was started by Senators Wagner, Ellender, and Taft? That is the clear, simple issue before the Senate at this time.

That is all I wish to say for the present. Does the Senator from Alabama desire time? If he does not, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of the time on this side.

Mr. CLARK. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). All remaining time has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment, "2–3–59—B", of the Senator from Pennsylvania. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] would each vote "yea."

On this vote, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] is paired with the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING]. If present and voting, the Senator from New Mexico would vote "nay," and the Senator from Alaska would vote "yea."

On this vote, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER]. If present and voting, the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "nay," and the Senator from Oregon would vote "yea."

Mr. DIRKSEN. I announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is absent; he is in his State to attend the funeral of a friend.

The Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER]. If present and voting, the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "nay," and the Senator from Oregon would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 56, as follows:

So Mr. CLARK's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TALMADGE in the chair). The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Monroney-Gore amendment is offered, there be allotted an hour on each side, 1 hour to be controlled by the proponents of the amendment and 1 hour by the opponents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Senator's request?

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, that agreement includes the amendment at the desk, 2–4–59—C. I am not sure whether the Senator from Tennessee may have another amendment. I have no objection to the proposed agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unanimous-consent request is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank my friend the Senator from Pennsylvania for yielding to me.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I call up my amendment identified as "2–3–59—C," and ask that it be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all that follows "1963;" in section 305 of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following: "except that such limit, and any such authorized increase therein, may be increased, at any time or times, by additional amounts aggregating not more than $150 million if such action is necessary to meet the needs of pending bona fide applications on file with the Administrator: Provided, That the amount of capital grants contracted for under this title prior to July 1, 1964, shall not exceed an aggregate of $3,450,000,000."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I desire to modify my amendment by changing the word "may" in the fourth line thereof to the word "shall."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment. It is so modified.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I hope I may have the attention of the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The purpose of this amendment is to provide an automatic escalator clause in the proposal for urban renewal which presently appears in the bill.

At the present time the provision is for $350 million a year for 6 years, but that amount can be increased, at the discretion of the President, to $500 million in any one year by borrowing from an authorization for a subsequent year.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The amendment does not change the amount in any sense whatsoever. It somewhat changes the formula by which the escalator clause will operate. I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator for accepting the amendment. I see the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is nodding his head. Therefore, I think a further explanation is unnecessary. I ask for a vote, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the committee amendment.

So Mr. CLARK's amendment to the amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, for myself, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. MCNAMARA, Mr. HART, Mr. GORE, Mr. YARBOROUGH, Mr. KERR, Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. LONG, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. GRUENING, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. MORSE, Mr. KEFAUVER, and Mr. LANGER, I call up my amendment "2-4-59—A," with a further amendment which I send to the desk, and ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, may we have order? A point of order, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. I make the point of order that the Senate is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 74, beginning with line 23, it is proposed to strike out all through line 4 on page 75.

On page 152, strike out lines 3 through 12.

On page 152, line 13, strike out "(c)" and insert in lieu thereof "(b)."

On page 153, line 4, strike out "(d)" and insert in lieu thereof "(c)."

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, this is a very simple amendment. First, it would freeze the interest rates at 4¾ percent on GI housing loans instead of permitting them to rise one-half of 1 percent to 5¼ percent, as proposed in the committee bill. Secondly, it would freeze the present rate at 4½ percent on Capehart housing, instead of permitting the rate to rise to 5 percent or to 5½ percent at the discretion of the Commissioner.

Mr. President, the amendment and the fiscal policy which it involves, far transcend anything contained in the housing bill. I think if we adopt the committee bill, we will be permitting a policy of continuing the upward spiral of interest charges fixed by the Congress, help speed ourselves toward a fiscal debacle.

I say that with all possible sincerity. The proposal which is made in the committee bill will have repercussions with respect to the difficult problem faced today by the Secretary of the Treasury in the selling of Government bonds. If the committee proposal is adopted, before the present session is completed, this year, the Secretary of the Treasury will be asking this Congress to break the statutory ceiling on interest charges on the public debt, which today stands at 4¼ percent. I know whereof I speak. I know the worry which the Secretary has with respect to the increasing difficulty of finding purchasers for Government securities which are being put on the market.

It is very well to say: "We have to have GI housing, therefore, we are going to again increase the ceiling which was raised one-fourth of 1 percent less than 10 months ago." Now we are asked to double that increase, by raising the rate another one-half of 1 percent only 10 months later. We shall then have raised the GI interest rate by three-fourths of 1 percent within a year.

These are federally insured mortgages. Certainly when the Congress legislates an upward spiral of interest costs it cannot be isolated and it will not be isolated from the impact this action will have on the cost of handling the Federal debt. The sitdown strike which is existing in the financing of Government securities does not just apply to mortgages on GI housing, but applies to every element of Federal financing. Under the tight money and the high interest rate policy of this administration, the bidding gets higher and higher.

Let us look at the record. Only last week the Secretary of the Treasury had to refinance more than a billion dollars' worth of long-term bonds on which the Government had been paying 2 percent interest. How did the Secretary manage to refinance those bonds? He refinanced with 2-year issues at 4-percent interest. The interest cost doubled in this refinancing operation.

If we follow the history of what the Treasury is being asked to pay for 90-day notes, we observe that the stranglehold on the financial structure by the men who have power in this administration is creating inflationary pressures beyond anything Congress would create in handling the budget of the President. How else can we explain the estimated $495 million increase, for the interest cost in this year's budget? That is a half billion dollars going out the window. As Cal Coolidge used to say, interest is "the rent for the money." It does not buy any aircraft. It does not buy any missiles. It does not buy any dams. It does not buy any highways or airports. This is price support for the bankers, which has been the policy of this administration ever since it took office. That policy has never let up 1 minute, in the drive for higher and higher interest rates, seeking more and more rent on the money.

It is now 10 months, almost to the day, since the Congress raised the GI interest rate by one-fourth of 1 percent. Then we were promised by every Republican speaker that such action was going to release a flood of money greatly needed to facilitate the sale of GI home mortgages in the open market. We were told it would do away with discount rates and would bring about private ownership of these mortgages, instead of channeling them into FNMA or other Government institutions.

The ink was hardly dry on the one-quarter of 1 percent interest hike 10 months ago before discounting started again. The discounting has been going on ever since. I venture to say that the ink will hardly be dry on the proposed increase, if agreed to, before we will find the money changers discounting again, thus absorbing more and more of the money which the GI will pay for his house. This will raise the interest costs from what they were before the last interest rate hike by an average of more than $6.10 a month in the rent, over a period of 30 years. It will raise the ultimate cost of ownership over the 30-year term of the mortgage, with the interest rate increase of one-quarter of 1 percent last year and one-half of 1 percent as proposed for this year, for a little $13,000 GI house by a total of $2,190.

This is no time to be raising prices on home ownership, or to force the GI's, whom we purport to help, to pay more and more interest. Under the guise of trying to help the GI's, the Government charges them—because we have a fund to make direct loans in areas where financing is not available, as the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. GORE) said last night—the highest interest rate ever charged an individual during the past 20 years by his Government.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield to my distinguished colleague.

Mr. GORE. Is not the effect of the interest rate provisions of the pending bill to inflate the cost of a house?

Mr. MONRONEY. Indeed it is. It increases the cost of ownership, or rent, or service on the debt, by more than $6.09 a month.

Mr. GORE. Does not the Senator find it an unusual performance for the great Government of the great United States of America to enact a law providing a Government guarantee for a mortgage on a home, yet finding itself either unable or unwilling to support that federally guaranteed mortgage at the face value thereof?

Mr. MONRONEY. I think it is disgraceful to allow those who have a corner on the money market to obtain almost as much interest today for a Government-insured mortgage as they used to get for mortgages without Government insurance. We partially vitiate the FHA and GI programs when we find the rate on Government-insured home mortgage loans kicking up around the 6 percent level.

The last section of my amendment deals with the provision which would increase the interest rate on Capehart housing, which today is 4¼ percent. The ceiling on such financing is 4½ percent, by legislative mandate. The proposal before us would increase it to 5 percent, with discretion to go to 5½ percent.

Capehart housing, which is military housing, is financed in its entirety, from the construction to complete payout, by Uncle Sam. This is the loan Uncle Sam gets for the houses built on military bases, which are supposed to pay out in 25 years at $90 a month. The renter is Uncle Sam, and the Congress pledges that money will be made available to the Department of Defense to pay the interest and principal on such loans.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The Government of the United States is making nuclear fuel available to private power companies for the development of atomic power at loans bearing 4 percent interest. It is lending money to shipbuilders at 3½ percent. What justification does the Senator find for raising the interest rate on veterans' loans to 5¼ percent, particularly when that has the far-reaching effect, to which the Senator has already referred, upon the interest cost of the national debt?

Mr. MONRONEY. I quite agree that we are demanding of the veterans more interest than we demand from purchasers of farms and other things which the Government finances. Certainly we are not giving the veterans anything. Those who think we are have not looked at the figures. A veteran can borrow from the VA, under the proposed increase, at 5¼ percent, or he can go to the FHA, which conducts a companion operation, and borrow for 5¼ percent, as of today. Historically there has always been a difference, by statute requiring that GI rates had to be one-half of 1 percent lower than FHA rates. This bill would wipe out that statutory difference. Are we giving the veteran anything? Today we are lending money to the nonveteran, or to anyone else, at the same 5¼ percent of FHA rate. That is the same rate which is proposed in the bill for loans to veterans.

As interest rates reach outer space, it is having the effect of giving priority to private investment rather than the financing of the $280 billion debt, which must be rolled over in huge amounts almost every other month by the Treasury.

When we again start interest rates up, the man who has money to invest on a long-term basis will wait for the next raise, and an increase of one-fourth of 1 percent or one-half of 1 percent will accomplish that result.

When the bill was before us 10 months ago my very dear friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT] said on the floor:

> By raising the interest rate one-half of 1 percent, a flood of money was brought to bear on the veterans' housing problem. A similar realistic facing of the interest problem of 1958 could bring about the same kind of result.

Where is the flood? It went down to a small trickle in about 3 months after the passage of that act.

My dear friend the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH] said on that occasion:

> What we are seeking to do in the bill is to provide the veterans, as the American Legion so urgently requests, with the same possibility of attracting money as is afforded other citizens, and at a differential of one-half of 1 percent * * *. The committee bill would establish a ceiling, not a floor.

Ten months ago there was the promise of great results. Throughout the debate we were told, "Give them this added money and we will be able to release a flood of private investments that will meet the need for GI housing."

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] pointed out that the mortgage rate decline was being delayed by a relatively small number of mortgage lenders, who can hold up the rate long after the general money market nas loosened.

I took occasion to point out that there was no wisdom in throwing a baby off the sleigh to the wolves, because every time we throw a baby off the sleigh the wolves will follow the sleigh for another baby. We threw one baby out, in the form of an additional one-fourth of 1 percent interest. The wolves are back looking for twins, one-half of 1 percent interest.

The Capehart mortgages are as good as a Government bond. Why should they bring 5 or 5½ percent interest, which is the proposed ceiling in the bill? What effect would breaking the ceiling have? It seems to me that when we increase the rate we are bound to increase the cost to the Government borrowing generally.

I took occasion to check the Capehart financing. We have outstanding, under construction today, $1,139 million worth of housing, and the Federal National Mortgage Association has commitments for $424 million of this money; $660 million is in private commitments. Using that as a gage, if we raise the interest rate on Capehart housing, by three-fourths of 1 percent, it would mean that in 30 years it will cost us $196,375,000. That is one example.

FNMA has a considerable portfolio of Government insured mortgages, a total of $3,244 million. A substantial proportion of them represent Capehart housing, at 4 percent. If we raise the rate to 5 percent on Capehart housing, we shall lose many millions of dollars in the resale value of these older issues.

Something will have to be done to keep from breaking the private contractors. I have talked to some of them, and they are very much concerned. They are relying on private financing for $660 million, and they have standby commitments on 4¼ percent mortgages. If we raise the rate to 5 percent, what will it do to those people? They are under firm contracts. The result will be that their 4¼-percent mortgages will be worth 95 instead of 100 percent on the market. Therefore they will have to further discount the bonds.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Tennessee, the cosponsor of the amendment.

Mr. GORE. Was not one of the principal purposes for which the Federal National Mortgage Association was created the support of Government-guaranteed and Government-insured home mortgages at par?

Mr. MONRONEY. It was; and it worked very well throughout the war years and throughout the postwar years under Democratic administrations. Then it was organized into a cooperative under a half private, half public operation.

Instead of supporting the mortgages at par, as was done under Democratic administrations, FNMA has since become the leading discount house in the country. The argument is, "We must reflect the discounts in the various States." Many builders have told me that the discounts are actually fixed by FNMA. They find out what the discounts are locally, and they join together and buy at the discounted rate, giving encouragement to the discounting of the home mortgages which the agency was originally founded to support.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The able Senator from Oklahoma was formerly a Member of the House of Representatives. It was my pleasure to serve with him as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee of that body. In that position he and I cooperated in the writing of housing legislation.

Therefore it is with some experience that he and I speak in this field. The Senator has served on the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate. He has just now said that FNMA operated successfully in supporting federally guaranteed home mortgages for a number of years.

Mr. MONRONEY. At par.

Mr. GORE. At par. I ask him whether it did not operate profitably to the Government as well as successfully to the homeowner.

Mr. MONRONEY. It operated at a very substantial profit. When a sitdown strike would occur among insurance companies and the New York banks, who control the money market, FNMA would buy those mortgages. When it was found that the Government was ready and willing to buy Government-insured mortgages at par, that would again start the flow of private money. The private sources would turn the faucet on. The Republican Members of the Senate forced through the one-fourth of 1 percent increase in the interest rate last year. The motivation of the proposed increase is again coming from the same side of the aisle. It will again benefit the men who can turn the money on or off. They are the men in the big money marts. Those operations will add fuel to inflation. The money manipulators would wreak havoc in our finances, at the expense of the public, so great is their greed for higher interest rates.

Mr. GORE. What the Senator proposes in his amendment is to retain the present interest rates. If his amendment is adopted, I shall then propose an amendment which will direct the Federal National Mortgage Association to do what it was created to do and to do what it did successfully and profitably for 14 years under three administrations; namely, support the price of Government-guaranteed and Government-insured home mortgages at par.

Mr. MONRONEY. I am glad to hear the distinguished Senator say that. We have discussed the subject. It can be seen that every time the interest rate jumps, the cost of housing goes up.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator agree that an inflationary spiral in interest rates is a major contributing cause to higher prices and thus a contributing cause to inflation itself?

Mr. MONRONEY. It certainly is, because the effect of the interest rates today bears on every part of the economy. If we raise the interest rate on housing, as the committee bill proposes to do, it will be followed by an increase in the cost of automobile financing and financing of appliances. It enters into the cost-of-living index by raising the purchase price, not just by the amount of the increase on the home mortgage—because that is prime credit—but a one-half of 1 percent rate can become a 2 percent interest rate in carrying charges on automobiles or 3 percent on washing machines. The cost of mortgages, the cost of the things the public buys, the cost of farm financing, and the cost of financing little businesses are all set in the same money market that the bill helps, and all of it takes its cue from the financing that is done by the Government.

I dread to face the people who brought about the election of overwhelming majorities of Democrats in the Senate and in the House when they find that the first bill which passed Congress was a bill designed to raise the interest rates on the things that they must buy.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. A moment ago the distinguished Senator spoke about the drive for higher interest rates coming from the other side of the aisle, from the Republicans. I campaigned in a number of States last fall, as did the distinguished Senator from Tennessee. I found that one of the great causes of dissatisfaction on the part of the American people with the Republican administration was the high interest rate constantly kiting up and up.

I ask the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, who is so ably presenting his argument, not for the Democratic Party, not for himself, not even for the Senate, but for the American people, if he does not think the tremendous Democratic vote last fall was a mandate to hold the line on interest rates and not to hike them another round.

Mr. MONRONEY. I am as certain of that as I am of anything I have ever believed. I am certain that the inclusion of a mandatory increase in interest rates in the first bill we pass will set a sorry pattern of achievement for a Democratic Senate, a Senate whose slight Democratic majority has been increased to almost a two-thirds majority. I think we have a mandate from the public. I do not think the mandate is to enrich the bankers of Wall Street or those who lend the people's money, who operate the big insurance companies, and who hold back and reserve their funds until the Government, on its knees, or Congress, by its lack of wisdom, goes through the stratosphere on interest rates for GI housing and on Capehart paper.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Before we leave the question of the inflationary effect of high interest rates, I wish to remind the Senator that we have either heard or read some sermonettes about how labor should be restrained, how labor should not ask for higher wages, and how higher wages have contributed to higher prices. How, I ask the Senator, will labor be discouraged from asking for higher wages, when by reason of higher interest rates houses will cost more, automobiles will cost more, and washing machines will cost more? How will labor be discouraged from making these demands when the general cost of living, the cost of going, the cost of doing, is increased?

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator is exactly correct. The imposition of increased interest rates will result in giving less and less for a price which is more and more.

Mr. GORE. As a small businessman in private life, I can testify that the cost of borrowing money reflects itself in a higher price for the commodity my business sells. Every other businessman can so testify.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. I do not wish to get into a debate or argument on the subject, but I think this is a good point at which to place certain facts in the RECORD.

The present law permits the interest rate for Capehart military housing to go up to 4½ percent. It permits the Administrator to raise that rate to 4½ percent. However he has set it at 4¼ percent. Therefore, he has never charged the maximum which Congress said he could charge.

For FHA housing—that is the big housing, the kind of houses which the wage earner of America buys—there has been a law for many years which permits the Administrator to charge as much as 6 percent interest, but until now he has raised it only as high as 5½ percent.

Under the Veterans' Act, the Administrator is permitted to charge up to 4¾ percent. But the rate has gone up only to 4½ percent, as I understand.

What we are talking about concerning so-called interest rates in the bill is not an increase in interest rates. We simply set for the Administrator a ceiling or a top beyond which he may not go. There is not a single section in the bill under which the Administrator has yet charged the highest interest rate the law permits.

I call attention to the mortgages for veterans, handled by the Veterans' Administration. Those matters are considered in the House by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, which is headed by Representative TEAGUE, of Texas.

Mr. MONRONEY. Will the Senator be so good as to yield himself time?

Mr. CAPEHART. I shall be very happy to speak on my own time.

Mr. MONRONEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CAPEHART. Representative OLIN TEAGUE is chairman of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs. That committee handles veterans' housing legislation in the House, and in a House bill has permitted the Administrator to increase the interest rate to 5¼ percent.

The House, which I am certain is not dominated by those mean Republicans the Senator from Oklahoma has been talking about, voted yesterday, 366 to 86, to permit the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to raise the interest rate on veterans' housing to 5¼ percent.

If that is all wrong, do not blame us Republicans; blame it on the Democratic control of the House. I think they did the right thing. If I had been a Member of the House, I would have voted for it. I shall vote for it here.

This does not mean that if we pass the bill, the Administrator will raise the interest rate to that point at the moment, because he has never yet done so. Similarly, the Federal Housing Administration has never raised its rate to 6 percent, although ever since the law went into effect, the FHA has been permitted to go to 6 percent.

Mr. MONRONEY. Did I correctly understand the Senator to say that the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs has not used the full authority we voted him last year—10 months ago?

Mr. CAPEHART. No. I am quite certain of that. Has he raised the rate to 4¾ percent?

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes; he has set it at 4¾ percent. We do not touch the FHA rate. The FHA has always had a statutory 6 percent ceiling.

Mr. CAPEHART. Their rate now is 5½ percent; is it not?

Mr. MONRONEY. It is 5¼ percent.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Capehart military housing rate is 4½ percent, but it has not gone beyond 4¼ percent. It could go up another 1¼ percent.

What the Committee on Banking and Currency endeavored to do with respect to the raising of the ceiling on interest rates was to make them all the same, on the premise that a wage earner, who may or may not have been in the service, is entitled to the same sort of treatment as one who was in the service, or vice versa. The Senator should understand that a veteran gets a great advantage because he can buy a house without any downpayment, whereas the wage earner cannot buy a house without a downpayment.

Mr. MONRONEY. The wage earner pays 5 percent.

Mr. CAPEHART. He pays anywhere from 5 to 10 percent.

Mr. MONRONEY. So we are not giving the veteran very much; are we?

Mr. CAPEHART. The veteran gets the benefit of not paying a service charge of one-half of 1 percent. We are merely endeavoring to treat everyone as nearly alike as we possibly can. We still want to give the veteran the advantage of no downpayment and of not paying the one-half of 1 percent service charge.

The bill passed by the House, sponsored by the Senator's Democratic colleague, Representative TEAGUE, chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, was passed yesterday by a vote of 366 to 86, purely on the basis that it might be necessary to increase the interest rate on veterans' mortgages, in order to enable veterans to get housing, in order to sell mortgages.

If the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs does not need to increase the rate to 5¼ percent, I am certain he will not do so, because the record of the Administrators of Veterans' Affairs, and of the Federal Housing Administration over the years, under both Democratic and Republican Presidents, is that they have never gone up to the ceilings, generally speaking. At least, the Administrator of the FHA has never done so.

Those are the facts. Perhaps Representative TEAGUE made a mistake. Perhaps his Committee on Veterans' Affairs, which handles veterans' matters exclusively, was wrong. Perhaps the House itself was wrong yesterday in passing the bill by a vote of 366 to 86. Perhaps the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, which voted unanimously to do what is now proposed, was wrong. But certainly we are trying to treat all people alike. We are trying to make it possible for mortgages to move; to make it possible to build homes and sell them; to maintain employment; and still to give veterans an advantage. That is the only reason for what we have done. There is no other reason. It has nothing to do with the general increase in interest rates or interest on bonds. That is another matter, and it was not considered by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. I feel certain that it was not considered by the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

I am simply trying to be factual; I am trying to state the facts, and trying to straighten out the record.

The Senator from Oklahoma is trying to leave the impression that the Veterans' Administrator will immediately increase the rate to 5¼ percent.

Mr. MONRONEY. He did increase the VA rate immediately following the last rise; he did not wait long. And now he is ready to make another increase in the VA rate.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator from Oklahoma assumes that he will do so as a result of this bill.

Mr. MONRONEY. He did that in the past. As a result of this bill, I expect the VA rate to rise; and when that happens, I expect the FHA rate to rise to one-half of 1 percent higher than the VA rate, because there has been a historic differential of one-half of 1 percent between the two rates. If the GI or VA rate is increased to 4¾ percent, I expect that the FHA rate will be increased to 5¼ percent, in order to preserve the historic differential.

Mr. CAPEHART. But the increase in the veterans' interest rate was not a Republican measure; it was passed by the House of Representatives, after it had been reported to the House by a committee headed by Representative TEAGUE, of Texas. If that was wrong, then the Democratic-controlled House made a mistake.

I do not like to have the Senator from Oklahoma state for the RECORD that this is a Republican measure. Such a statement should not be made, because the Senate Banking and Currency Committee is composed of 10 Democratic members and 5 Republican members, and they voted unanimously in favor of this provision.

In the House, I believe the Republicans have 160 Members; and 366 Members of the House voted to do that. Perhaps they did not know what they were doing; perhaps they made a mistake. But if they made a mistake, that is no reason why the Senate should make a mistake.

Mr. MONRONEY. And if the House did make a mistake, that is all the more reason why the Senate should not also make a mistake.

Mr. CAPEHART. Furthermore, the committee which handled this matter in the House of Representatives devotes its attention exclusively to veterans' affairs and, as a result, is close to the veterans.

There is now pending in the Senate a resolution for the establishment of a Veterans' Affairs Committee of the Senate. I favor the establishment of such a Senate committee, because I think such a committee can better handle such matters.

But in this instance a House committee which deals only with veterans' affairs, and which should have known what it was doing, reported the increase to the floor of the House; and then the House of Representatives voted for it by a vote of 366 to 86. So let us keep the record straight.

Perhaps it is not a good thing. I think it is. The Senator from Oklahoma is entitled to be opposed to it, if he wishes to be. But he should not be opposed to it on the basis that it has not been properly considered and that it is a Republican measure. Actually, it is not a Republican measure, and it was properly considered.

I am only making a sincere effort to make sure that a veteran, without making a downpayment, without paying a service charge of one-half of 1 percent, which the ordinary wage earner does have to pay, will be able to buy a home and will be able to have the mortgage on his home purchased by someone. If a veteran who wishes to purchase a home cannot sell a mortgage on his home, he cannot buy a home.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from Indiana yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LAUSCHE in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. Was the 5¼ percent contained in the Sparkman bill; and was the 5½-percent rate on Capehart housing contained in the Sparkman bill or in the Capehart bill?

Mr. CAPEHART. It was in the Sparkman bill.

Mr. MONRONEY. Is the Senator from Indiana certain of that? Let me ask whether the chairman of the committee is in the Chamber at this time. I cannot find such a provision in the Sparkman bill, but I found it in the Capehart bill.

Mr. CAPEHART. My memory on that point is not good; but I know that the committee—5 of us Republicans, and 10 Democrats—voted to put it in. My memory on that point is not good, and I do not know. But I know we considered it, and I know the vote was unanimous.

I also know that this committee accepted the increase in the ceiling in the case of veterans' housing only because the House had passed that measure and because the committee on that side of the Capitol asked the Senate to do likewise. That was the only reason why we did it.

Will the Senator from Oklahoma permit me to state, in my own time, that in the case of section 203, which deals with the sales of houses, we permitted the ceiling to rise to 6 percent, as it was in the case of FHA houses. Some $30 billion worth are outstanding.

In the case of rental housing, we permitted the rate to rise to a ceiling of 5½ percent; in the case of cooperative housing, we permitted the ceiling to rise to 6 percent; in the case of nursing homes, we permitted the ceiling to rise to 5½ percent; in the case of housing in renewal areas, we permitted the ceiling to rise to 6 percent; in the case of relocation rental houses, we permitted the ceiling to rise to 6 percent; in the case of military housing, we permitted the ceiling to rise to 5½ percent; and in the case of VA housing, we permitted the ceiling to rise to 5¼ percent, all in an effort to sell the bonds, because here are the facts, regardless of whether Senators like them or do not like them, regardless of whether the situation should be this way or should not be, regardless of whether it is wrong or whether it is right: The veterans' housing mortgages and many of the other mortgages were being sold at a discount, in order to equalize the rate or so that they would secure the same interest rate as that for the straight FHA housing. In other words, the mortgages were being discounted at 96 percent, 94 percent, 92 percent, or 90 percent, so that the income to the purchasers of such mortgages would be the same as in the case of what we call standard FHA mortgages for which the rate is, of course, 90 percent of the rate for an FHA loan.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from Indiana yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. For how many months after we pass this new interest rate increase bill does the Senator from Indiana expect these mortgages not to be discounted?

Mr. CAPEHART. I cannot answer that question.

Mr. MONRONEY. The last time the rate was increased, the discounting began 3 months afterward.

Mr. CAPEHART. Of course, I cannot answer that question, and neither can anyone else.

I am simply explaining what happened in the House of Representatives, and what happened in that committee, and why our committee voted for this: It was to try to make all Government-guaranteed, Government-sponsored mortgages carry the same interest rate, so there would not be any advantage or any disadvantage in the case of any of them, and in order to give the Administrator a ceiling to which he could raise the rate. Once that ceiling is established, the Administrator will be able to raise the rate as high as the ceiling; and, according to the market conditions, he will be able to raise the rate or to lower the rate.

Under the FHA, the rates have been raised or lowered, due to market conditions; but at no time have they ever been as high as 6 percent; at least, I believe that is a correct statement.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, how much time remains under my control?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the Senator from Indiana has used 12 minutes, and that the Senator from Oklahoma has 26 minutes remaining.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, it would be a very fine thing if only for once, when the authorities are leveling off the interest rates, the high rate might go down, instead of the low rate going up. But I have not seen that happen for a long, long time.

I have had a check made by the staff, and the staff finds that this increase in rates was not included in the Sparkman bill, but it was in the Capehart bill, which originated with the Republicans; and I have great suspicion that it got into the bill by means of the so-called overwhelming vote because the feeling in the committee was that the housing bill would be vetoed if it was not sugared up enough to please the occupant of the White House, who happens to believe in higher interest rates.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I shall be brief, but I wish to make a comment, for the record, in support of the position taken by the Senator from Oklahoma.

As he knows, I supported him in opposition to increases in the interest rates; that was my position the last time we had a fight on the floor of the Senate over proposals to increase the interest rates.

At this time I should like to ask several questions.

Is it the opinion of the Senator from Oklahoma that the American people made rather clear to us, in district after district, during the last campaign, that they were concerned about high interest rates?

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes; I thought that was one of the major issues in the campaign.

Mr. MORSE. Is the Senator from Oklahoma aware—as I am—that a good many Democratic candidates for election to both the Senate and the House of Representatives campaigned against high interest rates, and pledged that they would try to do something to protect the American people from being further exploited by the financial interests of the country, by constantly pushing up interest rates?

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes; that was one of the keystones of the campaign.

Mr. MORSE. Does the Senator from Oklahoma agree with me that one of the causes of the inflationary threat is the increase in the cost of money to borrowers?

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes; I would say that this is the major part of the Eisenhower inflation. As I pointed out earlier, this year the increase in the cost of carrying the public debt—or, as Cal Coolidge used to call it, the rent on the money—is half a billion dollars greater than it was last year; in fact, in the budget, the item for interest on the public debt is second in size only to the budget items for defense expenditures.

Mr. MORSE. Of course Oregon is, generally speaking, a one-industry State; that industry is lumber. Therefore, the effect of interest rates on housing construction is of vital concern to all the people of Oregon, in all economic groups. Does the Senator from Oklahome share my point of view that one of the reasons—although of course there were others—for the great slump in the home construction industry and the construction industry generally during the recession—which is far from over, as yet—was the problem of the increased cost of money, which discouraged people from building homes?

Mr. MONRONEY. Indeed I agree, plus the fact that the cost of raw materials—such as lumber, masonry, brick, or interior woodwork—has risen as the cycle of interest rates has risen. Today the interest rate is a very important part of all business costs.

Mr. MORSE. Assuming for a moment that a part of our problem is the increase in the cost of money, to the point that many veterans are discouraged from building homes or from buying homes, does the Senator from Oklahoma believe that when we have that kind of evil situation existing in a democracy, it then becomes the duty of the Government to step in and to offer remedies which will eliminate that evil, such as, for example, by making available Federal funds at reasonable interest rates, which will have the effect of driving the money changers out of the temples of Government?

Mr. MONRONEY. I do, indeed.

Mr. MORSE. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I am glad that no one will ever read in my voting record in the Senate of the United States tonight that I voted to impose what I think is an unconscionable interest rate proposal on the veterans of America.

Mr. MONRONEY. I thank my distinguished colleague. I am sure he will agree with me that when we talk about fixing ceilings, they mean nothing, as the distinguished Senator from Indiana has said. We have seen how the interest rate was increased for GI's last year, and how quickly the same old practice of discounting paper was resumed. It is so unnecessary.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GORE. Lest a new Member of the Senate may think the course suggested by the junior Senator from Oklahoma and the junior Senator from Tennessee is new and untried, let me point out that the Federal National Mortgage Association now has unused authority to purchase Government-guaranteed and Government-insured home mortgages in the amount of $1,400 million. I should like to point out further that its total authority in that regard is $2,800 million, of which amount it has used approximately one-half. I propose that this agency use this authority to support Government-guaranteed and insured mortgages on American homes at par value.

Mr. MONRONEY. I quite agree with my distinguished colleague. If the agency would stop operating merely to show a profit, if it would try to operate to serve the purpose for which it was established—namely, to support Government mortgages at par—we would not be called upon for all these increases, which cost hundreds upon hundreds of millions of dollars, or billions of dollars, before we get through with the interest charge. Yet the agency made last year—and it is very proud of it—$8,500 million. For the first 5 months of the fiscal year 1959, the agency has made $4,385 million.

I am in favor of private business making a profit, but I think the first duty of a Government agency is to do the job it was set up to do, and in this case it was to try to prevent inflationary charges of interest rates, by knocking down discount rates or by preventing spiraling rates of interest.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 10 minutes?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in the absence of other Senators who wish to speak in opposition, I am glad to do so. I yield the distinguished Senator from Connecticut 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I shall not speak long on this subject. It seems as though every time the question of interest rates comes before the Senate a great deal of misinformation is handed out and a great deal of misunderstanding is reflected in the remarks of various Senators.

I was impressed with the extreme statements made by the Senator from Oklahoma this evening, and I may say I was very unfavorably impressed by some of the conclusions which he drew respecting the matter under discussion—namely, the rising interest rates on veterans' loans.

The Senator from Oklahoma seemed to suggest there was some sort of collusion between the Committee on Banking and Currency and the evil bankers of Wall Street. I wonder if he thinks that collusion extends so far that the House of Representatives is also in league with the terrible Wall Street bankers, because the House of Representatives adopted the very proposal on which the Senate is asked to vote in this bill, namely, to increase the interest rate ceiling to 5¼ percent.

I remind my friend from Oklahoma and other Senators who are so favorable to his views that the Wall Street bankers are not interested in this proposal as Wall Street bankers, nor will they benefit from this proposal. The people who will benefit are the small savers of the United States, the people who own savings accounts, the people who have an interest in pension funds, the people who own life insurance policies and who have credits in savings and loan associations. Those are the funds which are loaned for mortgages. It is not the demand deposits of the commercial banks which are loaned. So the assertion that the proposal is a bankers' paradise is without foundation, in my judgment.

The allegations are unfair to the Banking and Currency Committee, which unanimously voted to report the bill to the Senate. There was no opposition to it. There was some discussion about it, but, in the final analysis, there was no opposition. I suggest, in all reason, that there is no basis for the suggestion that the proposal resulted from pressure from Wall Street or any other street, as the Senator from Oklahoma has indicated in his previous remarks.

Another assertion which keeps coming up when matters of this kind are discussed is the so-called tight money policy or high interest policy of this administration. I have repeatedly said on the floor of the Senate, and I say it again tonight, that there is no such policy. This administration has no tight money policy, and never has had. It has no high interest rate policy. But it has one policy which is very important to the American people regarding money, and that is a sound money policy. It has bent every effort to keep the money of this country on a sound basis. That is one of the issues involved in the proposal before the Senate.

My good friend from Oklahoma speaks of the inflationary force of the higher interest rates provided for in the bill. Actually, it is not an inflationary force at all. I submit that the history of Government finance in this country will show that it is artificially depressed interest rates which are inflationary and which have an inflationary effect, and not a policy which allows interest rates to move up and down as the law of supply and demand indicates.

So I dispute absolutely what my friend from Oklahoma asserts are the inflationary aspects of the bill. I submit the situation is exactly the opposite. The bill does not make for inflation. It makes for stability. It makes for a free market. It implements the sound money policy of this administration. I am pleased that the Banking and Currency Committee was wise enough to endorse the policy of the administration in submitting the 5¼ percent interest rate ceiling which is provided for in the Sparkman bill.

My good friend has mentioned, too, the Federal National Mortgage Association operation and said that FNMA was doing what it was created to do. I took issue with that statement yesterday, and I do it again, on the basis that FNMA was originally created to provide some stability to the mortgage market and to provide a secondary market for mortgages.

I submit that FNMA has gone far beyond the original conception of the organization. It is becoming an investment banker dealing in mortgages. I put in the RECORD yesterday—it is available at page 1755—a statement which shows that FNMA at the present time owns approximately $5,400 million of mortgages.

It is said that FNMA makes money for the taxpayers. I submitted yesterday a statement—it may be found in the RECORD at page 1755—which shows the net income it makes during the year. If one computes the total return on the $5,400 million of mortgages which were in the portfolio of FNMA at the end of 1958, he will see that the return on that amount was something on the order of two-thirds of 1 percent.

I submit, that is not very good business. I do not think that would attract the savings of any Senators or of any of their constituents.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. I am not one who is delighted with the way FNMA has proceeded, nor do I feel it is a particularly good idea for this Government to keep on plowing mortgages into the Federal Treasury, which is what the FNMA operation really does. I have no right to object to the holding of a view in this regard, but I take issue with the view that the FNMA operation is in its present form a sound one. I think it ought to be very substantially reduced. This is one of the reasons why I favor the Sparkman bill and the raising of the GI interest rate ceiling to 5¼ percent, so that we will attract money from the money market into these mortgages and will not further burden the Federal Treasury, which could be burdened under the provisions of the bill up to $150 million. This action would of course invade the budget by that much, if it were done in a budget year.

I am glad to yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. The able Senator has very frankly stated his views. That is characteristic of the distinguished Senator. Although the Senator thinks it is unsound, or at least a questionable policy, for an agency of the Government to provide a secondary market for Government-guaranteed mortgages, I think that such an activity on the part of the Government is absolutely essential to a Government guarantee of home loan mortgages.

The able Senator has said that the portfolio held by the Federal National Mortgage Association in 1958 showed a return of something less than 1 percent; is that correct?

Mr. BUSH. The Senator is correct.

Mr. GORE. I ask the Senator, was that a net return?

Mr. BUSH. Yes. That is based on a net income. It is called "net income during the year."

Mr. GORE. Then the able Senator confirms the fact that the agency, which now has in its secondary market portfolio approximately $1.4 billion of mortgages acquired since 1954, held in 1958 a total of between $4 billion and $5 billion of mortgages of all types, on which it realized a net profit.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. The Senator yielded to me.

Mr. BUSH. I have the floor, but I should like to respond to the Senator.

In the testimony before our committee I asked Mr. Baughman, who was the head of the FNMA organization, what the holdings of FNMA were at the most recent time. He told me the holdings were upwards of $5 billion.

The Senator mentioned a figure of $1½ billion, approximately, but the total holdings of FNMA at the present time are more than $5 billion. At the end of 1958 the holdings are as shown in the RECORD on page 1755. The statement of the FNMA organization shows the total. That is the statement of FNMA.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. I yield to the Senator, but I should like to have the Senator satisfy his mind that I am not dreaming up these figures. The information is in the RECORD, from the statement of the FNMA.

Mr. GORE. I understand. The Senator is referring to the total holdings, which include the holdings other than those in the particular category about which both the Senator from Connecticut and the junior Senator from Tennessee were speaking.

Mr. BUSH. I am speaking of the total holdings.

Mr. GORE. So the Senator is referring to total holdings, including military housing, section 202, farm programs, management-type cooperatives, and so on. If the Senator is referring to the total holdings then the appropriate figure is the one to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. BUSH. That is correct. I thank the Senator for that agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I have no wish to prolong the discussion. I hope Senators will see the favorable aspects of the bill and that they will support the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Banking and Currency by raising the permissive interest rate, so that the burden of financing these mortgages may be taken from the Treasury of the United States and the money may be provided in the long-term money market and the mortgage market of the people of the United States, the savers of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield such time as he may desire to the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD].

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I shall vote against this bill, because I regard it as bad legislation.

It was a bad bill as it was introduced. It was a bad bill as it was reported by the committee. And amendments from the floor have not improved it.

I make this statement after my own analysis of the bill as it was reported from the committee.

In the first place, it is expensive in terms of budgetary expenditures, in terms of authority to expend from public debt receipts, and in terms of committing public credit.

As the bill was reported from the committee, it provided authorizations for budgetary expenditures totaling $3,102 million—$2,277 million out of direct appropriations, and $825 million from authorizations to expend from public debt receipts. In addition, it authorizes further commitment of public credit in terms of Federal insurance and guarantee of private mortgages, and so forth, totaling $10,125 million. The grand total would be $13,227,025,000 in Federal money and public credit.

These amounts are available by years as follows:

For the current fiscal year 1959 the bill would authorize an additional $358 million in contract and other authority to appropriate, $825 million in authority to spend out of public debt receipts, and $5,125 million in additional public credit in terms of authority to insure and guarantee private mortgages—total $6,308 million.

For fiscal year 1960 the bill would authorize $358 million in contract and other authority to appropriate, and $5 billion in additional public credit in terms of authority to insure and guarantee private mortgages—total $5,358 million.

For fiscal year 1961 the bill would authorize $351 million in contract and other authority to appropriate.

For fiscal year 1962 the bill would authorize $351 million in contract and other authority to appropriate.

For fiscal year 1963 the bill would authorize $350 million in contract authority and other authority to appropriate.

For fiscal year 1964 the bill would authorize $350 million in contract authority and other authority to appropriate.

In addition, the bill provides:

First. One hundred and sixty million dollars in contract and appropriation authority without specific fiscal year limitation; and Second. Authority to spend from public debt receipts for the urban renewal program in unlimited amounts for an indefinite period, subject only to the discretion of the President.

In addition to the excessive costs incident to this legislation, the bill would loosen up virtually all of the numerous Federal housing programs.

I ask unanimous consent to have my analysis of the bill printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF PROVISIONS IN SENATE BILL 57 AS REPORTED

This omnibus housing bill of 1959 (S. 57) as reported by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, would authorize an additional $13.2 billion in Federal funds and public credit to loosen, liberalize, and finance the whole repertoire of Federal housing programs.

These Federal housing programs include FHA (Federal Housing Administration), college housing loans and guarantees, Fannie Mae (FNMA—Federal National Mortgage Association), farm housing, veterans' housing, city planning scholarships, and community facilities.

FHA

This bill would provide for the continuation of the FHA insurance program for another year through fiscal year 1960 with new and accelerated insuring authority of $10 billion—an additional $5 billion for fiscal year 1959 and $5 billion for fiscal year 1960.

(This proposed $5 billion for fiscal year 1959, together with the $4 billion enacted in the last session of Congress, would make a total of $9 billion in new insuring authority available during the current fiscal year 1959.)

With this acceleration, the bill would liberalize all aspects of the FHA insurance program, including coverage, insurable amounts, equity requirements, and cost limits.

Provisions of this bill would permit FHA mortgage insurance to cover commercial and community facilities (which the Commissioner deems "adequate to serve the occupants") constructed in connection with regular rental, cooperative, relocation, and the new elderly persons' housing programs.

The bill relieves banks of the full costs of foreclosure, etc., and requires FHA to pay them. In addition, the bill gives FHA authority to act to avoid foreclosure on certain mortgages (one- to four-family dwellings), by postponing foreclosure or by direct purchase prior to foreclosure. This, in effect, provides a moratorium, under certain conditions, on bad mortgages.

Almost universally throughout the FHA program, the bill would raise the level of unit cost limitations by 10 percent or more.

Some of the FHA programs, such as military housing, cooperative housing, and urban renewal relocation housing, are freely conceded to include economically unsound projects. The bill would greatly increase the so-called incentives for sponsors in these programs, as well as loosen and broaden their benefits and objectives.

Among other added incentives, the "replacement cost" basis for computing some insurable mortgages would be liberalized to cover up to 100 percent of "out-of-pocket" costs to the builder whatever these may be.

The bill's expressed objectives in this respect are to reduce the builder's equity in his own project, assure his profit and insure him against risk. At the same time, the bill would make it easy for fraudulent operators to evade the FHA "blacklist."

The bill would broaden relocation and other housing programs in urban renewal areas to include housing for individuals and single persons—roominghouses and hotel-dormitory type projects.

The military housing program would be revised to permit the Secretary of Defense to pay FHA mortgage insurance premiums for servicemen.

The bill would create a whole new loosely drawn 100 percent mortgage insurance program for so-called "housing for elderly persons." The program would include both dwelling units and nursing home facilities, as well as commercial and special facilities "adequate to serve the occupants."

This program is given a big fanfare in the bill as a housing program for elderly persons, but the actual language does not restrict occupancy to elderly persons. In fact, there is no limitation on rental rates or tenant income, and there is no restriction against luxury-type units. In this program the bill would waive all standards for economic soundness.

URBAN RENEWAL

The bill would extend and expand the urban renewal program and authorize $2,250 million in capital grants at the rate of $350 million a year for 6 years.

One of the urban renewal program objectives according to the bill would be to stimulate plans and projects on a statewide basis, and the bill directs the Administrator to encourage such projects.

The bill would set up a brandnew, unlimited, program of loose loans to local public agencies. These Federal funds, to be expended from public debt receipts, would be given to local public agencies for purchase of land and demolition of structures in a proposed general slum clearance area, before plans are formulated and costs are estimated. The lid is taken off of the $1 billion limitation on Federal funds available for urban renewal loans and left only to the discretion of the President. This is really a blue-sky provision for the space age.

The bill would set up another brandnew program of housing giveaways called community renewal grants to localities. The Federal funds would be spent for local long-range renewal planning, identification of potential slum areas, preparation of project plans and cost estimates, etc.

In addition, the bill would broaden renewal areas to include environs for special FHA mortgage and relocation subsidies. But the bill does not define environs.

The program originally contemplated that the localities bear one-third of the cost of their urban renewal projects. This bill would further lessen the contribution of the localities by allowing them credit for several new categories of noncash grants. Credit would be allowed for public utilities, improvements, etc., financed from revenue bonds. Credit would also be allowed to localities where educational institutions construct buildings or other improvements in or near the renewal area.

The $2,250 million in new urban renewal grant money authorized in this bill would be in addition to the $1,350 million already authorized for this purpose. Along with this $3.6 billion in money for grants there is also the unlimited authority to spend from the public debt for urban renewal loans.

In addition to all the direct Federal funds and credit available to the urban renewal program, this bill would amend the National Bank Act to allow private banking institutions to purchase local agency long-term, urban renewal bonds, which would be indirectly secured by the Federal Government. Under these provisions the Federal Government would, in effect, underwrite directly and indirectly the total loss of any project.

This bill would authorize appropriations of an additional $10 million (for a total of $20 million) for direct grants to assist urban planning in small communities.

FHA

With respect to public housing the bill would institute broad revisions of the program's aims and policies.

It is clear from the bill that public housing would be made an adjunct to urban renewal. PHA in the future would provide social and recreational guidance as well as low-rent housing to its tenants.

The bill would limit Federal control and enlarge the power of the autonomous local authorities through whom the Federal funds are spent.

In more detail, the new public housing policy objectives under the bill would include:

1. Development of low-rent housing in urban renewal areas.
2. Extend PHA program to include acquisition and rehabilitation of old houses, etc.
3. Vesting authority for determining tenant qualifications and rental rates in the local agencies, without PHA approval.
4. Allowing overincome tenants to continue occupancy of low-rent public housing units.

EDUCATIONAL HOUSING

The bill then would extend, expand, and revise the program for loans to educational institutions for so-called college housing. Federal funds in this program would be no longer limited to college housing. This bill would make them available also for construction and rehabilitation of classroom facilities, including buildings and equipment.

The present program is authorized to spend out of the public debt up to $925 million for college dormitory loans. This bill would increase the dormitory loan fund by $400 million to a total of $1,325 million. In addition, this bill would authorize expenditure of $125 million more for construction and rehabilitation of classroom facilities. These funds would be available for direct Federal long-term loans of up to 50 years at low-interest rates.

In addition to the $125 million direct loan fund under this new classroom facility program, the bill would authorize the HHFA Administrator to fully guarantee up to $125 million in long-term private borrowings by educational institutions for this purpose.

MILITARY HOUSING

It has been contended that the military housing program has been slow getting started, and for this reason the bill would extend the program for another year, liberalize it, increase the limitation on unit costs, etc.

The bill would create a new program of FHA mortgage insurance for housing in defense impacted areas with the broadest incentives, including waiver of all requirements for economic soundness.

In this program as in all others, the bill would allow inclusion of commercial and community facilities in mortgage amounts.

MISCELLANEOUS

In its more or less miscellaneous provisions, the bill would:

1. Increase FNMA special assistance activities in connection with housing in urban renewal areas by raising the individual mortgage ceilings to the maximum established by FHA.
2. Extend for 1 year FNMA authority to purchase at par mortgages under special assistance functions.
3. Authorize long range farm housing research at an expenditure rate of $75,000 a year for 3 years, with additional authorization for the current year.
4. "Express desire" that study and research be undertaken on subject of housing for migratory workers, and direct a new survey into status of public works planning.
5. Give the Veterans Administration another $300 million in authority to spend from public debt receipts for direct loans to veterans for housing. This brings the total program for direct housing loans to veterans to $1,383 million. This is in addition to unlimited authority to guarantee veterans' housing mortgages.
6. Consolidate Lanham Act with other low-rent projects.
7. Extend voluntary home mortgage credit program for 2 years through 1961.
8. Establish a brand-new 3 year program of grants for scholarships and fellowships to train "professional city planners."
9. Revive and extend the defunct Defense Housing and Community Facilities and Services Act, to provide Federal loans and grants for hospital construction.

THE MONEY

Analysis shows clearly that the bill is primarily for sponsors, builders, and lenders. Home buyers and tenants are necessary incidentals.

This has been a characteristic of housing legislation since World War II when the Federal Government began both direct and indirect subsidy of the housing industry in all of its principal facets by billions of dollars.

Public credit and Federal money authorized under this bill alone would total $13.2 billion; $10.1 billion in authority to guarantee and insure mortgages, $2.3 billion in contract authority and other authority to appropriate, and $825 million in authority to expend from public debt receipts.

In addition to this, the bill makes available an unlimited amount to be spent from public debt receipts subject only to the "discretion of the President."

As of the end of the last fiscal year, on June 30, 1958, existing authorizations for public credit and Federal money in housing totaled $47.4 billion. To this will be added all additional authority becoming effective since last June 30, including that granted in this bill.

More than $93 billion in public credit and Federal funds was used through Federal housing and related programs between 1933 and June 30, 1958. This figure represents total use of Federal authority to spend, insure, guarantee, etc., in all Federal housing and related programs, existing and expired. It is a cumulative gross total of loans and grants, mortgages purchased, loans insured, etc. It excludes repayments.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT].

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, the point of view with respect to interest rates on veterans' loans which has been expressed by my colleague from Oklahoma is one which has quite a few adherents in the Senate, and for many years it represented a majority opinion in the Committee on Banking and Currency. I am happy to say that this year the members of the committee realized that the program was effectively stifling the VA loan program. While there was a stifling of loans directly to veterans, the realism with which we freed the interest rates on FHA loans earlier has resulted in the largest number of housing starts in the past year, with I think two exceptions, in our history. There is plenty of money in the private money market for the building of homes, both with and without Government guarantee, at a realistic interest rate. The committee this time, in my opinion, has made it possible for the veterans to again secure private money for the building of homes.

I was impressed by the concern of the Senator from Oklahoma that we would be faced by a fiscal debacle; and that if the comparatively few loans were made at rates as high as 5¼ percent, they would be a lever to pry up the whole level of rates on Government loans to the point where it would produce an almost insurmountable obstacle for the financing of our Federal debt.

The fact that FHA has been able to secure billions of dollars in mortgage money at the realistic rate to which the VA loans are now raised, would indicate—and this has been going on for a year or so—that our friend is probably a little overconcerned about the effect on the fiscal program.

Actually the thing that is facing the whole mortgage market, and the whole problem of borrowing money at fixed interest, is the inflation that has gotten into the stock market. I heard one of America's leading stockbrokers make the comment the other day that he was dealing in secondhand securities. That is an interesting comment. Under present circumstances and in the present financial situation, it is almost impossible to get money for equity financing. It is becoming equally difficult to get people to lend money on fixed income obligations. The result is that the interest rates are being forced up, because there is a shortage of money in the market for mortgages and other fixed income obligations.

There is no sitdown strike on the part of bankers. There is a reluctance of American investors, American savers, institutional investors, and others to take their money away from the inflationary prospects created in the stock-market.

Over the past few years the committee has bewailed the fact that somehow veterans could not get any money for loans to build homes.

Instead of trying to keep the interest rates on VA loans substantially below those of FHA, since there is a Government guarantee behind both loans. I believe the Senate would be well advised to follow the lead of the committee and approve the proposed change in the interest rate. It is a change which would make these loans again attractive to the investors and make it possible for our veterans to get money through the Veterans' Administration system. I am sure that most of them in the past few years have not gone without mortgage money for their homes. They have turned, instead, to the FHA program, which was on a more realistic basis. I am happy to know that this new veterans' program will operate on a parallel and equally satisfactory basis.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I cannot dissociate the impact of a legislated interest rate increase throughout the whole structure of the Federal housing program from the borrowing that the Secretary of the Treasury will have to go through in the next year. The bill would help the moneylenders, the mortgage bankers, and a few who want to build a few more GI houses the easy way, and whose attitude is that they do not care, even if it would raise the interest cost to 6½ percent.

That does not seem very important to them, but it is very important from the standpoint of the inflationary impact. The fact is that these mortgages, when we put a premium on it, as we are doing by congressional action, absorbs the money that would be going into Government bonds. Of course we have seen the rate double and treble and quadruple on short-term issues. The spiral goes on and on, in the eager desire to make the wages of money so much higher than the wages of people. That is what the issue is today. Senators who wish to vote for that spiral will have to take the responsibility, but they will also eventually have to vote to break the ceiling on the interest the Government can pay, perhaps before Congress adjourns.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. In the first place, I could not agree more with the objectives and principles voiced by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Of course he is right. There is no question in my mind that he is right in saying that the interest rates are too high, and that this is a hard money administration.

This is a very difficult question for me to decide, particularly because the testimony before our Banking and Currency Committee was overwhelming that unless the artificial 4¾ rate is increased to 5¼ percent, no veterans' housing will be built. We are told that unless we do it, we will not help the veteran; we will not help the builder, and the building industry is a small business industry; we will not help the unemployed construction worker who needs a job building homes.

I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, whether he can in any way resolve this impasse. I would be happy to support him in his amendment if we could get the interest rate down or if we can provide a market for veteran mortgages in any other way so as to make it possible for veterans to build their homes. If we could do that, he would have my vote on his amendment. If I cannot be convinced that it can be done, I shall have to vote against his amendment.

Mr. MONRONEY. If the Government would accept, under this administration, the responsibility which the Government accepted under President Truman and President Roosevelt, and, through FNMA support the Government-insured mortgages at par, we would have an adequate amount of building, and we would get away from the inflationary spiral. All we have to do is give FNMA more money and give it the direction to support the mortgages at par. If we do that, we will get the private money out in a short time. It cost the Government nothing during the entire operation previously, and a profit was made by the Government under Democratic administrations. Shortly after the Republicans came into office they wanted to reorganize the whole program, and they turned it into another organization. It became a semiprivate operation. Instead of supporting the bonds, FNMA fixed uniform discount rates.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I realize the difficulties involved. However, is there anything in the Senator's amendment which would make it possible for FNMA to do it, or make it mandatory on the part of FNMA to do it, in view of the administration's attitude?

Mr. MONRONEY. My amendment does not include such a provision, but I understand that the distinguished Senator from Tennessee (Mr. GORE) has an amendment which would do it. If my amendment prevails, he intends to offer such an amendment.

Mr. GORE. Instead, I plan to offer it as an amendment to the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma. I propose to do it immediately after I obtain recognition.

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield for that purpose.

Mr. GORE. I should like to get the floor in my own right.

Mr. MONRONEY. I should like to yield some time to my distinguished senior colleague, if I may. How much time have I remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 11 minutes remaining; 24 minutes remain on the other side.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah will state it.

Mr. BENNETT. Did the time limitation agreement include amendments to the Monroney amendment, or would the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee be outside that time limitation agreement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The agreement is silent on amendments to an amendment. The Chair assumes that the answer is that the time limitation does not apply to the amendment.

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield 8 minutes to my distinguished senior colleague.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, any consideration of the amendment makes it necessary for us to look at the basic facts with reference to interest rates and inflation, as well as the contribution which the Government and its operation makes either to inflation or to the rate of interest required to be paid in the money market for loans. The present budget, which came to Congress the other day, calls for nearly $8,100 million for interest on the public debt in the fiscal year 1960.

That is between $2 billion and $2,200,-million more than was the interest on the public debt in fiscal 1952, the last full fiscal year of the previous administration. That means that the interest on the public debt has risen in excess of two-thirds of 1 percent of the total outstanding Government debt, in spite of the fact that a very large percentage of it still draws 2½ percent, the rate which was fixed prior to the inauguration of the Eisenhower administration. Interest rates are a full 1½ percent higher on Government financing today than they were when Mr. Eisenhower took office. That means that the interest required to be paid on private borrowing is 1½ percent higher, or more.

Since there is a total of in excess of $800 billion of public and private debt, that means that the borrowers of the country, including the Government, are now paying a penalty of at least $12 billion a year in excess interest, over and above what the going rate was in fiscal 1952, with reference to the debt, public and private, outstanding at that time.

Is there a Senator who can point to any other inflation contribution greater than the impact of that penalty of $12 billion a year in interest now being paid by the American people on public and private debts by reason of the fiscal policies and monetary control policies of this administration? The horror of horrors is that if present policies continue, that penalty will be fixed on the debt structure of the country when this administration goes out of power, and the American people will continue to pay that excess interest penalty for a generation.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I wish to verify the statement which the Senator from Oklahoma has made concerning the interest rate for individuals going up 1½ percent. In 1952 I was able to borrow from a bank in South Carolina at the rate of 3 percent. The bank said that that was the rate it was necessary to charge me in order to cover its costs.

The administration had not been in office, in 1953, much more than 9 months when I again went to the bank. At that time I was asked to pay 3½ percent, in order to cover the costs. One year later I went to the same bank to borrow again. At that time I was told that because the bank itself had to pay increased interest charges, I would have to pay 4 percent. Later the rate was increased from 4 percent to 4½ percent. On each occasion I was borrowing approximately the same amount for personal uses—$6,000, $8,000, or $10,000.

But in about March or April of last year the bank reduced its interest rate. It was election year. I went to the bank and said that since the interest rate had been raised on several occasions in previous years, they should then reduce it for me. The record will show that the bank did reduce the rate a half percent last year.

This is an example of how interest rates affect the individuals of the Nation when they seek to borrow small sums from their banks. In my own case, the amount was small. I needed $5,000 or $6,000 at that time. I can bear that statement out with proof. I shall be glad to show the notes to any Senator who wants to see them.

I predict that some time next year, just before the election, interest rates will be reduced a little. But if we adopt these additional rates, they will stay up.

Mr. KERR. I thank the Senator from South Carolina. I have one more observation to make.

Interest rates will be made either by Congress or by an agency to which Congress has delegated the power to fix the interest rates. Should Senators shy away from the duty of fixing interest rates, when if they fail to do so those interest rates will be fixed by the Federal Reserve System, which is a creature of Congress? There is not a Senator who does not know that the Federal Reserve System fixes the interest rates.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 8 minutes yielded to the Senator from Oklahoma have expired.

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield 3 additional minutes to the senior Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. KERR. Are we so timid, are we so scared of the power of members of an agency which is our creature, that we are afraid even to talk to them or to establish a policy by legislation which will govern them in the use of the powers which have been delegated to them by Congress?

If we increase the interest rate limit, as is proposed by the original bill, from 4¾ to 5¼ percent, it will mean that we shall have approved the fiscal control policies and monetary control policies of this administration through the Federal Reserve System, which has brought about the increases in interest rates now in existence. It will give that agency further evidence and indication that its actions have had our approval, and that we are either too timid or too cowardly to say to it, "The time has come to stop this mad and reckless increase in interest rates which affects the whole debt structure of the country."

I think Congress should recognize that either it will fix the interest rates or will decline or fail to exercise its prerogative to meet this responsibility, with the result that its creature, the Federal Reserve Board, will fix them.

Therefore, I urge support of the amendment of the distinguished junior Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Oklahoma it is proposed to add the following:

On page 148, between lines 14 and 15, insert the following:

"(b) (1) Section 303 of such Act is amended by striking out '$115,000,000' in subsections (d) and (e) and inserting in lieu thereof '$215,000,000'.

"(2) Section 304(c) of such Act is amended by striking out '$2250,000,000' and inserting in lieu thereof '$3,250,000,000'.

"(c) Section 304(a) of such Act is amended by striking out all that follows the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: 'Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, the price to be paid by the Association for mortgages purchased in its secondary market operations under this section shall be not less than the unpaid principal amount thereof at the time of purchase, with adjustments for interest and any comparable items, and no charges or fees for its services under this section shall be imposed by the Association.'"

On page 148, line 15, strike out "(b) (1)" and insert in lieu thereof "(d) (1)".

On page 149, line 6, strike out "(c)" and insert in lieu thereof "(e)".

On page 149, line 9, strike out "(d)" and insert in lieu thereof "(f)".

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield for that purpose?

Mr. GORE. I yield without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the amendment I have offered directs the Federal National Mortgage Association to support—by purchase, if necessary—home loan mortgages guaranteed or insured by the U.S. Government. That would not be a new endeavor for this governmental organization. Indeed, the Federal National Mortgage Association now has authorization to do exactly that, by the purchase of home loan mortgages guaranteed or insured by the Government, to the extent of $2,800 million. So what I am proposing is not an innovation; it is not an idea extracted from a foreign ideology. The amendment proposes that the Federal National Mortgage Association exercise the authority it now has, and use the funds now available to it for the same purpose for which it already has used approximately one-half of its authorization. Of the $2,-800 million authorization now available to the Federal National Mortgage Association for the purchase of Government-insured and Government-guaranteed home mortgages, it has used approximately one-half, or $1,400 million, which means that it has remaining, yet unused, an authorization of $1,400 million.

The amendment I have proposed directs it to support, at par, loans on American homes guaranteed or insured by the U.S. Government.

In addition to directing it to do so by using authorizations which the Congress already has provided, my amendment would strike out "$115,000,000", and would insert in lieu thereof "$215,000,000".

How would that part of the amendment operate? The amendment I have proposed would authorize the U.S. Treasury to purchase an additional $100 million worth of preferred stock of the Federal National Mortgage Association.

Under its charter and under the law, when the Treasury of the United States purchases one dollar's worth of preferred stock, the Federal National Mortgage Asssociation has authority to sell its debentures to the public or to the Treasury in the amount of $10. So, by authorizing the Treasury to purchase $100 million worth of stock—not to expend $100 million, but to buy stock in this organization, which has earned a profit throughout its existence—we would increase the borrowing authority of this governmental organization to $2,500 million, and we would direct that it use these funds and such other authority as it may have to support, at par, through secondary market operations, mortgages on American homes that are guaranteed or insured by the United States Government.

Mr. President, why does the Government of the United States insure a mortgage on an American home? We have undertaken to have the Government do so in order to broaden home ownership. What institution is more basic to our way of life than home ownership? What will contribute more to the stability of our way of life than to make it possible for young husbands and wives to build or to buy decent homes in which to rear their children? Ah, Mr. President, what better security is there than a mortgage on an American home, signed by the father and the mother, the husband and the wife, and then guaranteed by the Government of the United States?

I say to you, Mr. President, that if it is wise for the United States Government to guarantee the soundness of a loan on an American home, then it is obligatory upon us to make that guarantee effective. Is not ours a Government of dignity and integrity? Why would we go through a pusillanimous operation of guaranteeing a mortgage on an American home, and then sit idly by and see it subjected to discounts under the table?

Mr. President, I am willing to support a home ownership program which will make available to American men and women who wish to build homes or to buy homes credit at reasonable rates of interest. In fact, not only am I willing to do so, but I propose to direct that the Government provide a market for these mortgages, at par.

Lest someone think this a radical proposal, let me point out that it comes, not from a distant land, but from successful experiences in three administrations of the United States Government—namely, the administration under the late President Roosevelt, the administration of former President Truman, and for the first 2 years of the administration of President Eisenhower.

Yet, Mr. President, the first bill to be considered by this new Congress, a Democratic Congress, is a measure, not to instill life into a successful Democratic program, but a bill which would constitute an endorsement of the tight-money policy, against which every Member on this side of the aisle who campaigned in the last November election, or at least almost every one of them, inveighed.

The senior Senator from Oklahoma has just made some provocative remarks about the burdens which the tight money policy of the government has brought upon the people; but half the story will not have been told, unless the Congress of the United States asserts the constitutional power and prerogative which belongs to it, and which can be exercised only by it or through its delegation.

I should like to supplement the able statement of the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma by citing one or two other instances. In the President's budget for the fiscal year 1960 the interest charges for carrying the public debt amount to 70 percent more than did the interest charges in 1946, when there was a debt of comparable proportions.

Let me cite another statistic. In 1945, when our national debt was $258 billion, the interest paid on the debt was $3,621 million. Let me repeat: $3,621 million.

The President requests that the Congress appropriate for next year $8,100 million to pay interest on the public debt. More than 10 cents out of every Federal tax dollar next year will go to pay interest on the public debt.

As the Senator from Oklahoma pointed out, if this unwise and unsound policy is pursued, unchecked and unhindered by the Congress of the United States, as the outstanding obligations mature and are refunded at higher rates, the burden which the American taxpayers must bear will go upward; and upward, by ever and ever larger amounts, must go the taxes they pay.

Why do I refer to the public debt of the United States in a discussion of the pending issue? I do so because this high interest program is part and parcel of the monetary and fiscal policies of our Government, which must be checked, which must be resisted, if we are to avoid the catastrophic consequences to which I have referred.

Mr. President, it will be recalled that 1 year ago the United States Senate was very much disturbed about unemployment and about the recession. Do Senators realize that 1 year ago, when we were so disturbed by unemployment in America, 5 percent of our working population was unemployed? I take it they do. Let me invite their attention to the fact that 6 percent of our working population is now totally unemployed, and some millions more are partially unemployed. Moreover, I call attention to the fact that 1 year ago the tight money policy had forced down Government bonds to $12 or $13 below par. During the current week, bonds of the U.S. Government have sold at $15 below par. Yesterday bonds of the United States were quoted at 85.12——

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONRONEY. The distinguished Senator is referring to the fact that the bond market of the U.S. Government is going lower and lower. Does he not believe that if the Senate announces it is in favor of an inflationary increase, and ratifies it by voting to allow interest rates on Capehart housing to go to 5½ percent, we shall force the market on Government bonds still lower?

Mr. GORE. In reply to the able Senator, I should like first to call attention to the fact that as the U.S. Senate became more and more concerned with the dangers of recession and the consequences of the tight-money, high-interest rate policy 1 year ago, one Senator after another took the floor of the Senate and cried out against it. Partly as a result of that, and I believe partly out of concern over the danger of a recession, the Government of the United States reversed its policy, and for the following few months the interest rates of the U.S. Government underwent the most drastic reduction in the history of our country. But once the Congress had adjourned, the field was reversed, and the interest rate on Government obligations was deliberately pushed higher for the past 5 months at the most rapid rate in the entire history of the U.S. Government.

I should like to point out that from a low on U.S. bills—that is short-term paper—of less than 1 percent in June—0.881—the interest rate increased to 2.814 in December.

I should like to remind the Senator from Oklahoma that interest on prime commercial paper followed a similar course. From a low in July of 1.50, it followed the course set by the Government and rose to 3.33 in December.

Municipal bonds—bonds which the counties, the States, and the cities must sell to build schools and hospitals and to provide matching funds for the highway program—have suffered by this policy until one State legislature after another is now finding it necessary either to have new bond issues or to levy additional taxes in order to meet the additional obligations brought about as a result of the policies of the administration.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GORE. I had not quite finished my reply to the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma. When I complete my reply I shall yield to the Senator from Ohio.

So, to answer specifically the question of the Senator from Oklahoma, my answer is in the affirmative. If this Congress embraces and endorses the tight money policy, which is tighter now than it was a year ago, and if it endorses the high interest rate, which is higher now than it was a year ago, the influence of its action will be felt.

I daresay the Secretary of the Treasury might soon be before the Congress asking that the statutory limit on interest on Government bonds, which is now 4¼ percent, be increased. But I serve notice now, that if that occurs the battleline will be drawn and the trenches will be dug deep. Somewhere, somehow, someplace this ravage of the earnings of the American people who must borrow in order to live and build, must stop. A determined fight will be made to stop this process.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. KERR. Is it not entirely possible that if the Congress should raise the interest rate which it will guarantee on an evidence of indebtedness issued by an agency of the Government to the point of 5¼ or 5½ percent, we might contribute toward what might become the necessity for the Secretary of the Treasury to ask to have the limit of 4¼ percent, which is now in effect with reference to Government bonds, increased so that Government bonds would be competitive with other bonds which might be authorized by the act, guaranteed by the Federal Government, which would bear from 5¼ to 5½ percent interest?

Mr. GORE. The question of the able senior Senator from Oklahoma, first, illustrates his own keen awareness and understanding of the problem and, second, dramatizes the consequences of the action which I fear the U.S. Senate is about to take.

This is a strange performance. Like other Senators, I had the privilege and honor of going to the American people during the campaign last fall. Never once did I make a speech or hear a candidate on the Democratic ticket make a speech in the course of the campaign in which the Republican administration and Republican Party were not taken to task for the tight money and high interest rate policy which had brought on a recession, had brought on unemployment, and had stymied the housing program. Not only before the election was reference made to this subject, but our distinguished and able majority leader, whom I regard as one of the most able parliamentarians and political leaders who have graced and honored this Chamber and whose services this body has enjoyed during its history, referred to the issue on November 7, 1958, in a speech at Big Springs, Tex. I wish to quote one sentence from the speech:

> We need to face up to the high interest rates which are slowing the needed growth of our economy.

Mr. President, now is the time to face up to the problem. This is the first bill in connection with which the issue is presented, yet it is proposed to increase to 5¼ percent the interest rate on direct loans to veterans.

Our Government, with the approval of the Congress, makes loans to shipbuilders at 3½ percent; to private power companies at 4 percent, for the acquisition of nuclear fuel; and to REA cooperatives at 2 percent. Despite that, it is now proposed to charge a veteran, who has served his country in uniform, 5¼ percent interest on a mortgage on his home. Not only is that proposed, but, as the junior Senator from Oklahoma has said, other interest rate increases are proposed.

Mr. President, the Congress should face up to the one big issue in this session, which is the monetary and fiscal policy of our Government. I think we should start facing up to it wherever we see it and wherever we meet it. The Constitution of the United States places that responsibility upon the Congress. Congress must either exercise the responsibility or delegate it.

Mr. President, I now yield to the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE].

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to ask a question for information. The Senator from Tennessee stated that Government bonds sold last week at 84. Does the Senator know the rate of interest those bonds bear?

Mr. GORE. I was referring to the 2½ percent victory bonds which many people bought in response to patriotic urging.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator yield so that I may make a brief statement?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I was on the bench as a judge in the 1930's. I sat in the room where the foreclosures came through; foreclosures on chattel mortgages, on sales contracts, and on land mortgages. There was nothing more painful for me to do as a judge than to calculate the huge deficiency in interest, add it to the defaulted principal, and order the property sold. Too frequently did I see before me debtors begging for help. I knew those debtors bought under circumstances under which they should not have bought. I knew they paid discounts. I vowed to myself—I would then have done it if it had not been for my oath—to hit that interest charge. Interest went up to 8 percent in some instances.

I have sympathy for the proposition argued by the Senator from Oklahoma—that is, that the moneylenders will take as much interest as the traffic will bear, and some day we may have to put a lower limitation upon the interest rate charged to private borrowers, exactly as we have put a limitation on the interest rate which may be charged to the Federal Government.

I thank the Senator very much for yielding to me.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator for his able contribution. In reply I invite attention to the fact that the last bond issued by the U.S. Government was issued with an interest rate of 4 percent, but today that bond is selling in New York at 98. This illustrates the point made by the senior Senator from Oklahoma.

Further, I remind the senior Senator from Ohio that in 1952 income from interest in the United States amounted to 2.43 percent of the total national income. The last figure I have is for the second quarter of 1958. In the second quarter of 1958 income from interest had jumped to 3.72 percent of the entire national income of all the people and corporations of the United States. These figures show how the present policies are bringing about a redistribution and a reconcentration of the income, economic opportunities, and benefits of the people of the United States.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONRONEY. The distinguished Senator mentioned loans the Federal Government made to shipowners, I believe at 3½ percent, and to other loans. The Senator is also aware of the fact that we have made countless loans at 2 percent to former enemies of ours in the foreign field.

Do we not stand in a rather poor position when we make loans at low interest rates for all other purposes and then, when the veteran comes before us for a GI housing program, say to him, "We are helping the veterans by raising the interest rates"? How are we helping the veteran? We are raising the interest on his GI home to exactly the same level anyone will pay under the FHA program. Why have a GI program?

Mr. GORE. Where is the veteran's preference?

Mr. MONRONEY. There is no veteran's preference when the man who stayed home, or anyone else, can take advantage of the same program. Children who were born during the war can borrow at exactly the same rate. Let us change the name of the GI housing program and call it something like a "hypo" housing program, because that is what we are trying to do. The advertising agencies know that is a familiar term. When one wants to "hypo" sales one employs a few special gadgets or gimmicks. We are going to see this program "hypoed." There was a jump from 4½ percent to 4¾ percent only 10 months ago. That action was supposed to release a flood of money. We were told we would never have to worry any more about discounts, yet within 3 months from the date of the increase the mortgages were still being knocked down below par.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator. First let me say that in addition to lending money to shipbuilders at 3½ percent, we provide direct subsidies for part of the cost of construction. I point out that the amendment which I have offered applies not only to veteran's home loan mortgages, but also to U.S. Government-insured home loan mortgages.

Lest someone should think that this is an expenditure, that this is pouring money down a rathole, I point out that what I propose is that the Treasury buy $100 million of preferred stock in this partially owned Government agency, which has earned a net profit during its entire operation, and that its investments be made in mortgages on American homes, which mortgages the Government of the United States has guaranteed or insured in the first place.

How does the program operate? Under the law, when the Treasury invests

$1 in stock, the Association is permitted to borrow $10. The additional $100 million of capitalization authorized by my amendment will enable this agency to borrow $1 billion from the public or from the Treasury. That is to be added to the $1,400 million authorization which FNMA already has for this purpose, and which has been approved by Congress, following a practice tried and true and tested.

Mr. MONRONEY rose.

Mr. GORE. I now yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONRONEY. I am very much interested in the Senator's amendment, which is offered as an amendment to my amendment. I would certainly be against his amendment if it were not for the fact that my amendment freezes the interest rates where they are. I am sure that is the way the distinguished junior Senator from Tennessee feels, namely, that we are not going to support the FNMA operations, as he insists in his amendment, if we are going to go through the stratosphere by increasing the ceiling rates on GI loans or Capehart housing.

Mr. GORE. I agree. I have talked with members of the Committee on Banking and Currency, for whom I have the highest regard, and I understand from them that they supported an increase in interest rates because they thought that without such an increase the veterans could not obtain a loan to build or buy homes.

My amendment, which, I understand, the distinguished junior Senator from Oklahoma is willing to accept, provides that FNMA, created for the very purpose of supporting mortgages guaranteed or insured by the U.S. Government on American homes, will be directed to provide a secondary market at par, thereby making loans available. That is the understanding of the Senator, I believe.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct. That would apply to mortgages issued after the passage of this act.

Mr. GORE. Therefore the basis on which some members of the Committee on Banking and Currency were ready to support this interest provision would not exist with the adoption of the proposed amendment.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. As I understand the Senator's proposal, it requires only the investment of $100 million of Treasury money in stock of the Federal National Mortgage Association. Is that correct?

Mr. GORE. That is correct.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Federal National Mortgage Association has in its portfolio about $3½ billion of first mortgage bonds on American homes, which are Government insured. Is that correct?

Mr. GORE. I believe that to be correct.

Mr. MONRONEY. So this is to be an investment of $100 million additional in the portfolio of the $3½ billion worth of first mortages on American homes.

Mr. GORE. On the question whether or not this is a new operation, the distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut referred earlier in the debate to the fact that in 1958 this Government organization had in its portfolio between $4 billion and $5 billion worth of mortgages and that it realized a net profit on that portfolio.

Mr. MONRONEY. Inasmuch as we are considering the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, which would provide for the investment of nearly a hundred million dollars in this type of financial operation, is there any difference whatever, except perhaps that the securities held by FNMA will be better, because they will be Government insured, between the reserves FNMA will have and the reserves of the New York Life Insurance Co., the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Co., or the Northwestern Life Insurance Co., or other life insurance companies, which stand behind the life insurance policies of the people of this country?

Mr. GORE. I can think of no better investment than mortgages on American homes guaranteed by the Government of the United States. Yet we permit them to be discounted. A Democratic Congress with a new mandate from the people, proposes to make it worse.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I congratulate my colleague on bringing this issue before the Senate at this time and upon the very splendid exposition he has made on the question of why we should not raise the GI interest rate and why we should not further embark on a tight money policy.

We hear many people say that the reason the GI rate must be raised is that at par the veterans must discount their mortgages, and therefore it is necessary to raise the interest rate so as to stop the discounting.

Mr. GORE. If we provide a market for those mortgages, that will not be necessary.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I was about to say that the Senator has proposed a method whereby there will be a market at par. That is what the Government ought to do.

Mr. GORE. If the Government is unwilling to support the mortgages at par, why does it guarantee them in the first place? Of what value is the guaranty if it is not good for 100 cents on the dollar?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Senator is exactly correct. I wish to point out to the Senator also that it is well for us to look at the tight-money policy right now in a general sense. We know that the tight-money policy which was embarked upon at one time actually contributed toward the creation of the depression.

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. KEFAUVER. It was embarked upon for the purpose of drying up purchasing power. As the senior Senator from Oklahoma has pointed out, there were no goods in short supply. The hard-money policy will work only when there is bidding for short-supply merchandise, but that was not the situation at that time.

That is not the situation now. Some of our plants have been operating at 50 or 60 percent of capacity. We have 4 million unemployed. Therefore we have the facilities and the means of making more than the American people want to buy. Therefore the hard money will not thwart the inflation or stop the inflationary trends, but will, instead, contribute toward them. That is the finding of everyone who has studied the problem seriously. Anyone who thinks we must have high interest rates to further enrich the Nation's bankers in order to stop inflation is on the wrong track. The hard-money policy has discouraged small business and homebuilding and has prevented small-business people from having opportunities, and is actually encouraging inflation.

I am glad that the Senator from Oklahoma will accept my colleague's amendment. I hope we can face up to the issue immediately, at the beginning of this Congress.

Mr. GORE. I thank my colleague.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. I wonder if I may also have the attention of the distinguished junior Senator from Oklahoma on this question. It is a very involved question.

First I wish to commend both the junior Senator from Oklahoma and the junior Senator from Tennessee for a very clear exposition of a very involved and intricate subject.

This question arises in my mind. Let us assume that there is a home purchaser in Pueblo, Colo., who wishes to buy a house for, in round figures, let us say—$10,000. He enters into a contract with a builder. The builder or contractor needs construction money. The contractor goes into the money market in order to get the $10,000. Would he not at present have to accept a discount on the loan of about 8 points?

Mr. MONRONEY. If he were getting a construction loan.

Mr. CARROLL. A construction loan.

Mr. MONRONEY. He probably would. When the house was finished, a permanent mortgage would be placed on the house at a value of $10,000, if that was what the appraisal was.

Mr. CARROLL. Let us assume the contractor got a $10,000 construction loan. He would really get $9,200, would he not?

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct.

Mr. CARROLL. So he would have an $800 loss. Let us assume that the amendment as modified by the junior Senator from Tennessee were agreed to. What would happen? Under the Gore "Fanny Mae" amendment, would there be a windfall to those who now hold discounted notes?

Mr. MONRONEY. No, definitely. The junior Senator from Tennessee has a perfecting amendment which prevents any purchasing at par by FNMA of securities issued before the passage of the bill.

Mr. CARROLL. Let me pursue this a little further, because I am in hearty accord with the arguments made by the junior Senator from Oklahoma and the junior Senator from Tennessee. Would it not be possible to perfect the Gore amendment and limit its effect specifically to new construction, so that there would be no such windfall to those who might in the future acquire discounted mortgages? This is what I propose.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is what the Senator from Tennessee intends to do.

Mr. GORE. That is fully the intent; but since the question has been raised, I wish to modify my amendment to make it unmistakably clear. After "mortgages," on the line in the center of the page, I propose to insert: "which are executed after the effective date of the Housing Act of 1959 and are".

Mr. CARROLL. That will make it unmistakably clear, if there is any question about it, so that those who read the RECORD will know that it is the intent of the Senate, if these amendments are adopted, that we do not intend to give a windfall to the present holders of discounted secondary market mortgages.

Mr. GORE. Does not the Senator think this modification makes that intent plain?

Mr. CARROLL. I think the amendment of the junior Senator from Tennessee now clarifies that point. It expresses our intent, and makes clear to FNMA and the mortgageholders what limits we are imposing with this amendment.

If I may presume for a moment more on the time of the able Senators who have introduced the amendment as modified, I wish to call attention to a very significant article which was published in today's Wall Street Journal. The title is: "Commercial Paper Dealers Reduce Rate by ⅛ Point."

On the very day when the Senate is debating this important interest-rate question, we find that commercial paper dealers are marking down, by one-eighth of a point, their rates on unsecured promissory notes sold in the open market.

The Congress is now called upon to increase interest rates on Government insured veterans' housing precisely at the time when Government short-term bills are being sold at a current low average yield to investors. I read this paragraph from the Wall Street Journal article:

> The U.S. Treasury sold an issue of 91-day bills last Monday at an average yield to investors of 2.721 percent, the lowest since early January and down from the 2.975 percent a week earlier.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article may be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Feb. 5, 1959]

COMMERCIAL PAPER DEALERS REDUCE RATE BY ONE-EIGHTH POINT—CUT CANCELS INCREASE MADE ON JANUARY 21; NEW RATES RANGE FROM 3¼ TO 3¾ PERCENT—TREASURY YIELD DROP CITED

NEW YORK.—Commercial paper dealers marked down by one-eighth point the rates on unsecured promissory notes sold in the open market.

The reduction erases a one-eighth point increase made by the dealers on January 21 and puts the rates back to the level set last December 31.

Dealers said the cut reflects recent declines in the yields on U.S. Treasury bills which compete with commercial paper for short-term investment funds. Also, the supply of commercial paper has been on the low side, and the lower rates might attract more borrowers to raise short-term funds with commercial paper, dealers said.

Meanwhile, the rates on commercial paper placed directly with investors by major sales finance concerns remains unchanged at 2¾ percent to 3¼ percent for paper maturing in 1 to 9 months. Two large sales finance firms had increased their rates by one-eighth point late last month but canceled the increase earlier this week. Other major finance companies had not raised their rates.

The new rates on 4- to 6-month paper sold in the open market by dealers range from 3¼ percent on the notes of leading industrial concerns to 3¾ percent on those of less well-known firms and smaller sales finance companies.

The U.S. Treasury sold an issue of 91-day bills last Monday at an average yield to investors of 2.721 percent—the lowest since early January and down from the 2.975 percent a week earlier. A companion issue of 26-week bills drew a 3.107 percent rate last Monday, down from 3.337 percent the previous week.

Commercial paper is the money-market term for two types of short-term borrowings of companies, mostly for seasonal needs. One type is the so-called open-market paper sold by dealers for industrial names and smaller finance companies, normally to banks outside New York City. The other type consists of the I O U's issued by large sales finance companies which they place directly with investors, often other corporations.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, this is a very important point. If the Senate now establishes a high rate of interest in VA housing, in face of what is happening today in the commercial paper market, we shall be acting as a magnet to draw up the rates of interest throughout the economy at the very time when we are trying to fight the fires of inflation.

Mr. MONRONEY. Does not the Senator from Colorado think that this is a sort of price-support program for the barefoot boys of Wall Street?

Mr. CARROLL. I had not thought of it in those terms, but it is a very colorful way to express what this body may do.

I am heartily in accord with the comments of the junior Senator from Oklahoma and the junior Senator from Tennessee. If we miss this opportunity to hold down interest rates, we shall again feed the fires of inflation. As we well know, high interest rates are building up the public debt. The service on the public debt now amounts to $8 billion or 10 percent of the Federal budget.

Here is an opportunity for us to act wisely and hold down increases in interest rates on the Federal debt.

I thank the junior Senator from Tennessee for modifying the amendment which he has offered to shut off a possible windfall to those who now hold discounted mortgages.

Mr. GORE. I thank the junior Senator from Colorado.

Mr. President, what do we offer to the American people? Tighter money? Higher interest rates? More inflation in the cost of homes? That is not the issue upon which we won the endorsement of the American people. The American people expect more and better of us.

This is the first issue, and the most important issue, to face the United States and Congress in 1959 or 1960. I am not referring simply to the mortgages on veterans' homes; I am speaking of the fiscal and monetary policy of the U.S. Government, which is deliberately, by design and plan, reconcentrating the income, the wealth, and the economic opportunities in the United States.

I am willing to face up to the issue whenever I see it. This is the first time is has come. Let us face it now.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, a strong argument for increasing the interest rate for VA mortgages is made in the report on S. 57, the omnibus housing bill.

The trouble is, however, that it is a strong argument in favor of the bankers' position, and not the position of the veterans for whom this program was established.

We are asked now to increase the rate from the present 4¾ to a new high of 5¼ percent, an increase of a full half of 1 percent.

Also, the bill would strike out another important protection, the provision which requires that the VA rate be at least one-half of 1 percent below the FHA rate.

This program began with an interest rate of 4 percent. Then the rate rose to 4½ percent, then just last year Congress raised the rate again to the present level of 4¾ percent.

Senators will recall the 47 to 47 vote when this matter was before the Senate last March. The Vice President helped to decide the issue in favor of higher interest payments for the veterans by failing to break the tie. Year after year the interest rate has gone up; and year after year the bankers have blackjacked Congress into increasing the rate to veterans through the simple device of withholding funds from the program.

Now the bankers are back again. Again their argument is that a higher rate is necessary because the current 4¾-percent rate is not "attractive" to investors, and that it should be brought nearer to the level of the FHA rate and the conventional market rate.

I agree that the current rate is not attractive to investors. The only rate that seems to be attractive is the highest one the market can bear. That is the goal here, I am sure.

The goal of the administration and its high-interest friends seems to be to keep raising the VA rate until it is at a par with the market level, and then to do away with the statutory ceiling altogether.

Then the investors can have the security of a Federal guarantee of the loan, as well as the profits of the current market interest rate.

That is where this veterans' loan program is heading if Congress keeps accepting these rate increases.

I think this procedure does a disservice to the veteran who wants a home on a reasonable mortgage and to the entire economy, because raising the VA rate puts a sort of stamp of approval on the administration's discriminatory money policies.

I think Congress is going about this problem backward. Instead of knuckling under to the demands of the administration and its banker friends, we should be taking the opposite course. We should be exercising our powers in the field of fiscal policy to counteract the tight-money policy of the administration.

Instead of permitting the administration to force a rise in the VA interest rate to the level of FHA or conventional mortgages, we should require that those rates be lowered to the VA level.

I think Congress could, if it wished to exercise the responsibility, fix a statutory limit on interest rates generally. Perhaps we will come to that soon.

I submit that Congress must call a halt to this economic blackmail. The place to start is the rejection of the proposed increase in the VA interest rate.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I thank God that I live in a country and under a system of government where the prices of commodities can go up and down; where interest rates can go up and down; where the prices of bonds can go up and down; where wages can go up and down; where a man can quit his job and get another one; where a man can buy what he wishes or decline to buy. I thank God that I live under a free enterprise system, under the kind of government we have.

Senators can solve the problems which have been complained about by adopting the kind of government which exists in other countries. These problems can be solved by having price control, wage control, rent control, interest control. We can adopt the same kind of government as exists in other places.

Senators have been talking about the veterans, and have been saying that we should not increase these interest rates, and so forth. Senators have been talking about the very thing the veterans fought for and died for—namely, the American system of government, the private enterprise system of government.

Mr. President, Senators can vote to solve these problems. Of course, Senators can vote for the adoption of a system of government in which the government will buy all the mortgages, will own all the homes, will own all the factories, will dictate to every man and woman what he shall buy and what he shall not buy, and at what prices. Senators can vote for all that if they wish to do so; that is their privilege. That is really what some Senators have been talking about tonight. Perhaps they may not really have been talking about such things; they may have been directing their remarks to the amendment which I submitted, and which I now hold in my hand. But most of the colloquy was on the basis that our Government should control and control and control.

Mr. President, I do not care whether this amendment is voted for by all Senators or is not. But if the Government can control interest rates, it can control wages and prices. I ask my colleagues, in all sincerity, Why should that be done? Do they want the Government to control the savings of the wage earners?

Where is the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], who once represented some of the unions, and once was the great president of a union? Does he want to have the Government control the wages of those workers? Is he more interested in what he was talking about here tonight than he is in the wage earner who is paid $1.50 or $2 an hour or less?

The question before us is very, very simple: Do we, or do we not, want a system of government in which prices go up and down, wages go up and down, discounts go up and down, a system under which a man can quit his job and can get another one? Do Senators want to maintain the kind of government our Nation has had for 170 years—a system of government under which discounts have gone up during that time and interest rates have risen during that time? Or do Senators want a system of government under which the Government will impose controls?

Mr. President, I see virtue in what Senators have been talking about; and I wish the people of our country could enjoy low interest rates, high wages, and low prices. I wish our people could enjoy all of them. But that cannot happen under the American private enterprise system of government, the American free system of government.

So Senators must decide whether they wish to maintain the American system of government in all its phases or whether they want a controlled economy, whether they want a dictator, whether they want to adopt the kind of government that exists today in Russia. The government which now exists in Russia controls everything in that country. Our Government cannot control part of our economy without controlling all of it. That is why I am so certain on this issue.

I know the Senators who tonight have been advocating such things, and I cannot believe they have been sincere in all the statements they have made tonight because I am sure they are great Americans, and I know that all of them are veterans, and I know all of them are taxpayers, and I know that all of them are patriotic. So I do not believe they are sincere in advocating what they have advocated here tonight, because our country cannot be half free and half controlled. Why should Senators vote to discourage a wage earner from saving money, from investing it in bonds or stocks or in other ways, and from obtaining an equitable income from it—a parity income, an income comparable to the wages paid in the United States and the prices which everyone else in our country pays?

Why do Senators say such things? Why do Senators wish to give comfort to Mr. Khrushchev and the communistic or socialistic system of such controls, which have been advocated from time to time?

Let us be free. Let us vote to defend and protect our American system of government. Let us not vote to break it down piece by piece. Let us not vote to cut off the dog's tail piece by piece. However, that is what would be done under the policies some Senators have advocated and under similar policies.

Oh, Mr. President, perhaps their proposal is an innocent-looking one; but I point out that such Senators have advocated that the Government put up $100 million, and permit the Federal National Mortgage Association, a corporation totally owned by the Government, to purchase $100 million worth of such mortgages. I would not object to it, perhaps, if that were the only way the problem could be handled. But it is not necessary to proceed in that way.

However, even if it were necessary, why should we vote to break down our great American system of government? Why should we vote to break down the great system of government which has served our country so well for 170 years?

Mr. President, what do such Senators mean when on this floor they argue that they want to arm our country against a government which is 100 percent directly opposed to ours? What do Senators who have made some of the proposals we have heard tonight mean when they say they oppose such a system of government? What are such Senators thinking about? What is in their minds?

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I shall yield the floor in a moment; and then the Senator from Oklahoma can speak, if he wishes to do so.

Mr. KERR. Well, Mr. President, how can the Senator——

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I am not going to yield to the able Senator from Oklahoma, because I know about what he would say. [Laughter.]

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I rise to a point of personal privilege. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAPEHART. I know——

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, if the man is psychic, I want to leave this Chamber. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I know that the able Senator from Oklahoma has been one of the great beneficiaries of the American private enterprise system—perhaps to a greater extent than has any other Member of the Senate. I know he is defended and protected by the 27½ percent depletion allowance for the oil business, in which he is engaged. I am 100 percent in favor of that, and I will vote to defend it and protect it, because I believe in it. I know he has made a great deal of money in the oil business, under our private enterprise system; and I am for him, and I hope he makes more money, because that is the private enterprise system. I am going to fight for the private enterprise system, because it is directly opposed to the communistic or the socialistic system.

Mr. President, I am not confining my remarks to the pending amendment. I am addressing myself to the inferences to be drawn from some of the speeches which have been made here tonight. References have been made to "the money changers" and to "taking advantage of the American people," and so forth. I admit that some of that exists; there is no question about it. I know our people are not perfect. I know I make mistakes, and I know that all other Members of the Senate make mistakes. But I am talking about the general principle of the American system of government. I oppose burning down a church or a house in order to get rid of the mice that may be in it. But that is about what some Senators have advocated here tonight; in effect, they have advocated going against the American system of government.

Senators can talk, if they wish, about a mandate from the American people at the last election; but I do not think the people mandated the Congress to liquidate the American system of government. I do not think they mandated the Congress to liquidate the private enterprise system. I do not think they mandated the Congress to set interest rates and to have the Federal Government buy billions of dollars' worth of mortgages. I do not think the people mandated any such things; I am sure they did not.

Of course Senators can say what they please. But I say to my colleagues that I am not speaking about the pending amendment; instead, I am speaking against the inferences that can be drawn from statements of the sort to which I have referred in the last few minutes—inferences which will give comfort to our enemy. That is the trouble with such statements.

Mr. President, I know from personal experience that statements made on the floor of the Senate are repeated to the people of the Government which is our enemy. I do not doubt that that Government will repeat to its people some of the statements which have been made today in this Chamber, and will tell its people that Members of the U.S. Senate have talked about "the money changers" and have said that the people of the United States are mistreated.

So I ask Senators please to wake up, because if they do not, one of these days it will be too late.

Let us do what we should to change our laws in such ways as to correct inequities and protect and defend ourselves. But let us not make statements from which our enemy can obtain comfort, statements which will enable that Government to say to its people, "Haven't we been telling you that the capitalistic system is no good? Now we have the proof, because in the U.S. Senate, Senators are saying that the Government of the United States is taking advantage of the American veterans."

Mr. President, some may say that what I am saying now is a little harsh. On the other hand, certainly some of the things that some Senators have said today about me and about the people in whom I believe and about the party in which I believe have been rather rough, too. However, I know that those Senators do not mean such things.

Mr. President, I say to those Senators that they are making a mistake, and they should stop it.

After all, we are faced with a great threat, in the form of communism or socialism, or whatever one may care to call it—a system of government which threatens us, both militarily and economically. Then why do Senators give comfort to our enemy, by means of their statements on the floor of the Senate? Why do they make it possible for our enemy to broadcast to its people that U.S. Senators have talked about the money changers and about the evils of the private enterprise system, and about taking advantage of Americans? Why do Senators make such statements?

Certainly we can vote to correct the mistakes which are made in this country, and to correct any inequities which have developed. But certainly they can be corrected without having Senators indulge in personalities and accusations such as the ones I have listened to today on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, Senators should stop making such statements; Senators should stop giving comfort to our enemy.

Let all of us stand foursquare behind the American system of government, or the private enterprise system, which it really is.

Yes; let us correct it. Let us do what we should to correct it. But let us stand by it and let us praise it. Let us praise the millions of Americans who have saved enough money to buy insurance policies, who have invested their money in insurance companies, who are now buying mortgages so that GI's and other wage earners can buy homes. Let us have a little praise for the American people who saved their money, because all the bank deposits are represented by the deposits of millions of Americans—wage earners, GI's, and all the rest of them.

Let us have a little praise for our companies, which are represented by millions and millions of stockholders who are common folks, who are wage earners, who are GI's, who are widows, who are widowers, who are schoolteachers on annuities, who are living off their interest. Without the money of the people who buy the mortgages we are talking about tonight, there would be one thing this Congress would be doing now. If it were not for the millions and millions of American people who saved money to buy mortgages, and if they did not have the money, the Congress would be faced tonight with the problem of furnishing Government money to buy those mortgages.

So let us give these people a fair return on their savings, because their costs have gone up, their grocery bills have gone up, everything they buy has gone up. Even Senators today are getting $22,500 a year. When I came to the Senate 15 years ago the salary of Senators was $10,000. Why is not one who saved $10,000 from hard work—and most of the money comes from that kind of people—entitled to an increase in interest rates over what he was getting 10, or 15, or 20 years ago?

Let us cut out the chaff and get down to the wheat. Let us use commonsense. Let us defend this great system of ours. Let us correct the inequities. But let us not destroy our system. Let us not, on the floor of the U.S. Senate, say things our enemies can use against us and quote to the people of China and other peoples throughout the world to whom we would like to sell our idea of government. Let us not put into their mouths words that they can quote to the people of China, Malaya, and backward countries, that the private enterprise system, the American system, the capitalistic system is no good because certain high officials in that system said it was not good. Let us not do it. Believe me, I feel that way about it. I am begging Senators to be careful, because we are up against it, so far as an enemy is concerned, both economically and militarily.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. I was touched by the speech of the Senator from Indiana, but it has nothing to do with the issue presented by the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from Tennessee. I quote from an article from a Washington Republican "socialistic" newspaper, the Evening Star, of January 26, 1959. The article is entitled "Your Money's Worth—$8 Billion a Year for Interest."

The article reads:

> Ten cents of every dollar in Federal taxes in the next fiscal year will go for interest on Treasury securities. * * *
>
> Today the national debt is around $282.7 billion, not much higher than at the close of World War II. But the yearly payment by the Treasury to security holders is over $8 billion—an upsurge of more than 70 percent.

This, I think, is where the Democrats and the Republicans can have an honest difference of opinion, and we are willing to go to the country on this issue.

I am still quoting from the article:

> It's a tale that cries out for explaining, for while there will be congressional debates on spending for farm supports, veterans' benefits, housing, foreign aid, etc., there will be little nose about this far bigger chunk of spending.
> And the reason is that Congress can't do a thing about this expense. Once the Treasury has pledged to pay a specified rate to a buyer of its obligations, it must pay that rate for the life of the obligation.

The article then goes on to discuss the President's message and his estimate of $8.1 billion for debt interest alone in the fiscal year of 1960.

This is a very good point for all of us to think about. We can go home and talk to our people about this issue.

I quote further from the article:

> What has been happening? A key point is that it has not been an accidental swelling in spending. Rather, it has been the result of deliberate policies.

We do not have to talk about Malaya, China, and the Soviet Union. We do not have to talk about what may happen in other countries.

I resume reading from the article:

First, the Federal Reserve System has been encouraging rising interest rates across the board through most of this decade. In simplest words, the theory has been: Higher costs of borrowing money will restrict speculative activities by curbing marginal borrowing, and this will help restrain price rises.

Let us not talk about the Democratic Party and charges of socialism. This policy was supported by Republicans through the last decade, in my own experience. Let me tell Senators what that policy is. I am quoting from the article:

Second, under President Eisenhower the heads of the Treasury—

After having the Federal Reserve System set the policy—

Under President Eisenhower—

A Republican President, although he is denied by some—the heads of the Treasury have not fought the higher borrowing costs—as did the Treasury chiefs under President Roosevelt and President Truman. In simplest words, the position of the Treasury in this era has been—

This is very important and this is the issue we will carry to the country—

The Treasury should not get special protection against a general rise in borrowing costs. The Treasury is just another borrower competing for available funds, and it should compete as others do—meaning the Treasury must pay the price (the interest rate) demanded by lenders for cash.

The result of these policies has been that as the Treasury has borrowed new cash in recent years and replaced maturing I O U's with new ones, it has paid higher and higher rates.

This is one of the most important issues before the American people today.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the article by Sylvia Porter, from which I have been reading, printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star, Jan. 26, 1959]

EIGHT BILLION A YEAR FOR INTEREST

(By Sylvia Porter)

Ten cents for every dollar in Federal taxes in the next fiscal year will go for interest on Treasury securities.

This slice of the budget is second only to that taken by the catchall "major national security." It dwarfs the 7 cents of every dollar going for all veterans' services and benefits, tops the 8 cents of every dollar going for all farm programs.

Of the billions pouring into the Treasury in the year starting in mid-1959, more than $8 billion will be automatically set aside for public debt interest.

This total represents a new peak in the cost of carrying the debt, compares with an annual interest load of $1 billion as recently as 1940.

Today the national debt is around $282.7 billion, not much higher than at the close of World War II. But the yearly payment by the Treasury to security holders is over $8 billion—an upsurge of more than 70 percent.

It's a tale that cries out for explaining; for, while there will be congressional debates on spending for farm supports, veterans' benefits, housing, foreign aid, etc., there will be little noise about this far bigger chunk of spending.

And the reason is that Congress can't do a thing about this expense. Once the Treasury has pledged to pay a specified rate to a buyer of its obligations, it must pay that rate for the life of the obligation. When the President, in his budget message, estimated $8.1 billion for debt interest alone in the 1959–60 fiscal year, he wasn't exaggerating one bit.

What has been happening? A key point is that it has not been an "accidental" swelling in spending. Rather, it has been the result of deliberate policies.

First, the Federal Reserve System has been encouraging rising interest rates across the board through most of the decade. In simplest words, the theory has been: "Higher costs of borrowing money will restrict speculative activities by curbing marginal borrowing, and this will help restrain price rises. When business is swinging upward, the costs of borrowing money should properly go up, too. Only when business is declining should we expect lower borrowing costs."

Second, under President Eisenhower, the heads of the Treasury have not fought the higher borrowing costs—as did the Treasury chiefs under President Roosevelt and President Truman. In simplest words, the position of the Treasury in this era has been: "The Treasury should not get special protection against a general rise in borrowing costs. The Treasury is just another borrower competing for available funds, and it should compete as others do—meaning the Treasury must pay the price (the interest rate) demanded by lenders for cash."

The result of these policies has been that, as the Treasury has borrowed new cash in recent years and replaced maturing I O U's with new ones, it has paid higher and higher rates.

In World War II the going interest rate on long-term Treasury bonds was 2½ percent a year. Today the going rate on similar bonds is over 4 percent a year—the Treasury can't get much cash even at that rate.

Sure, the United States can "afford" today's debt and interest load—but that doesn't make $8 billion a year in interest alone any less staggering.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, this is the central issue developed by the junior Senator from Oklahoma and the junior Senator from Tennessee, as I see it. A few moments ago I read from an article in the Wall Street Journal that commercial rates on short-term paper are falling. The Senate is now about to pass a bill permitting higher interest rates which will act as a magnet to draw up interest rates on the money the U.S. Treasury must borrow.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARROLL. Yes.

Mr. CAPEHART. Congress is not increasing the rates. Congress is increasing the ceiling under which the Administrator, in his judgment, in the months or years to come, may increase the rates. The law from the very beginning of FHA permitted a ceiling of 6 percent on the great bulk of mortgages. At no time has the Administrator of FHA, either under the Democrats or under the Republicans, increased the interest rate to 6 percent. At the moment it is 5½ percent. Congress is not increasing the rate. It is simply increasing the ceiling to which the Administrator can go, if he wishes to go and thinks it is necessary.

Mr. CARROLL. I know that.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator tried to leave the impression that Congress was setting the rate. Congress is not setting the rate. It is setting the maximum ceiling to which the Administrator may go.

Mr. CARROLL. The Senator from Indiana knows that if Congress sets the standard, the agency will conform to the standard. We had this question before us last year.

Mr. CAPEHART. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CARROLL. I want to answer the Senator for just a moment. There was debate on this question last year. We increased the interest rate ceiling and within a short time the actual rate was raised to the new ceiling. I ask the junior Senator from Oklahoma if I am correct about this. I think we wanted to set the interest rate at 4½ percent. The other side did not agree with us. It wanted 4¾ percent. Today we are willing to go up one-quarter of a percent from our 4½ percent of last year and hold the rate at 4¾ percent. But now the standard is not high enough. Now the other side is requesting 5¼ percent. That is the issue before this body. The issue will be carried to the country. The point I wish to make is this——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARROLL. May I finish? I shall be through in just a moment.

Some have said that the difficulty is that the home builders must get money, and that there is a tight money market. It is said that venture money will not move into the home building market, and we cannot get the money at less than 5¼ percent.

However, the junior Senator from Oklahoma has put his finger on a very important point. When we set the standard at 5¼ percent, that acts as a magnet and it will draw up the interest on Government bonds. That is the one great danger we ought to be thinking about.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARROLL. I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Several Senators are absent from the Chamber. It is a reasonably late hour. I have talked with the proponents of the amendment and to the members of the subcommittee, and I wonder if the Senator could give me an estimate as to how much longer he desires to speak.

Mr. CARROLL. I will say to the majority leader that one of the reasons I had to respond to the Senator from Indiana is that I did not want the Senator to leave the impression that we were trying to create a great scare.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. What I am attempting to do now is to get some estimate as to how long it will be before we can conclude this evening. I hope the Senator can give me some idea as to how long he will take. The junior Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] wants to address the Senate for 10 minutes. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] would like to have 5 minutes.

If the Senator from Colorado can give me an indication of how long he would like to speak, I should like to reach unanimous consent on a time to have a vote. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and other Senators are attending a meeting and would like to be present for the vote. We would like to notify them as much in advance as we can.

Mr. CARROLL. I will say to the majority leader that I believe the record is so clear with respect to the actions of both the Roosevelt administration and the Truman administration with reference to stabilizing the interest on the public debt and the fact that we have not been leading the Nation down to ruin and socialism, that the junior Senator from Colorado now yields the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] may be recognized for not to exceed 10 minutes; that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] may be recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes——

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should like to have 1 minute.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I should like to have not to exceed 10 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] may be recognized for not to exceed 10 minutes; that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] may be recognized for not to exceed 10 minutes; and that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] may be recognized for not to exceed 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, does the Senator from Connecticut desire some time?

Mr. BUSH. Yes. I should like to reserve not to exceed 5 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Connecticut be recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes. I hope we can get a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to reserve 5 minutes for myself. I may not use the time, but I should like to reserve it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I hope the Senator has said all he intends to say on the matter.

Mr. CAPEHART. I have, unless it is necessary for me to answer some remark.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I modify my request to include the request that the Senator from Indiana be recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I now ask the attachés of the Senate on each side of the aisle to please notify all absent Senators that we have not to exceed 35 minutes before we come to a vote. I ask attachés to ask Senators to return to the Chamber. We expect to have a vote on this question this evening. I should like to have final action on the measure this evening, and I should like to request the yeas and nays, if they have not been ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator requesting the yeas and nays on the Gore amendment?

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, it is the Monroney amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, before the decision is announced I accept the Gore amendment as an amendment to my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are ordered on the Monroney amendment, as modified.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I cannot tell Senators exactly how long it will be before the vote is taken. There are 35 minutes of possible debate. If all Senators use all time we will vote at 10:05. If any Senator is very prudent and wants to take no chance he should be here about 5 minutes before 10 o'clock.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on final passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment, have they not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been requested. Is there a sufficient second?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I asked for the yeas and nays on the Monroney amendment, which is the pending business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays were ordered on the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thought the yeas and nays had been ordered. May we have the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been requested. Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, may we have an agreement, on passage of the bill, that debate will not exced 15 minutes for each side? I ask unanimous consent that debate be limited to not exceed 15 minutes for each side. We can yield the time back if we do not use it.

Mr. BUSH. Mr President, will the Senator state his request again?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that there be 15 minutes of debate, pro and con, on the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, we have heard a good bit of discussion about the cost of the high interest rates proposed in the Republican amendment which was placed in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the vote is taken on the Monroney-Gore amendment and after the time is consumed on the bill that the Senate then proceed to vote on passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I want to make it clear that we will not have any other intervening amendments offered.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I should like to inform the majority leader that there are some amendments which will not require any time, but there are some amendments more or less technical in nature and some more or less minor things we have been holding back. It will take a few minutes to get action on those.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, that is agreeable, so long as we do not use time. The items can be considered and can be accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Texas.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, we have had a great deal of discussion about the high cost of interest rates. Let us stop and consider for a moment what the higher interest rates cost in terms of actual services to the people, in the way of the goods they use, the houses in which they live, or the equipment which might be used by them.

I heard testimony given today by a qualified economist before a Senate committee on what a higher interest rate actually means in terms of school construction. In traveling over my home State last fall, I was told many times, "We voted bonds for a new schoolhouse—we voted bonds for a new jail—we voted bonds for a new city hall—we voted bonds for a new library building—or for some other public building—but before we could get the plans drawn and approved there was a change in the interest rates and we could not build the building we planned because of the increased interest rates."

Sometimes an increase of one-half of 1 percent denies a community the benefit of another building, another schoolhouse, another courthouse, or another public library.

I should like to give the actual figures for one school district in the State of Minnesota, which was discussed today by an economist from the department of economics of the University of Minnesota, who testified before a Senate committee. He cited the case of a school district where a bond issue was voted last year for the building of a new 25-room school building. Before the bonds could be marketed and before the architect's plans could be approved, the interest rates went up 1 percent. With the same capital amount of bonds to be marketed, the architect had to redraw the plans. What was the effect on those plans? It was necessary to cut five rooms from the school building. That is an actual case. It was necessary to build a 20-room schoolhouse instead of a 25-room schoolhouse because of a 1 percent increase in interest rate. That is what the Republican high interest rate means. That is one reason why we are 140,000 school rooms short in the United States of America this year. That is why there are so many seats on this side of the aisle this year and so few on the Republican side.

However, I want to warn my Democratic colleagues in the Senate, that the Democratic Party made a pledge to the American people that it would fight these high interest rates and this hard-money policy, yet the first bill we have to consider, which comes from the committee, would "kite" the interest rate on Government-guaranteed loans.

As the junior Senator from Tennessee so aptly pointed out, there is no better security in the world than the security which has the endorsement of an American family, of a husband and wife signing their personal pledge that they will pay the note, guaranteed by a mortgage on a piece of real estate, which is their home, and then guaranteed by all the resources and might and power of the American Government.

Governments fail at times, but private property remains. Sometimes property is lost, but a man carries out his obligations.

This is the type of gilt-edged security which is better than anything else. This is the pledge of an honorable man to pay for his home, secured by the real estate, and guaranteed by the Government of the United States.

The committee has reported a bill which says that despite the pledge of payment by the Government of the United States, the pledge of payment by the family, and the security of the mortgaged home, we are going to permit the interest rate to be "kited" another half percent. It ignores the fact that the rate was raised last year.

Mr. President, I should like to point out that the bill as originally introduced did not have that provision in it. I am a coauthor, but it did not have this interest rate increase as it was originally introduced. As amended in the committee, this bill raises interest rates one-half of 1 percent, not only for veterans' loans but for all loans under the bill.

We have given an example as to what happens to the number of rooms that must be cut out with respect to construction of a schoolhouse if the interest rate is raised just 1 percent. The raising of the interest rate 1 percent for a bond issue, with respect to a 25-room schoolhouse, cut off 5 rooms from the school. That has happened all over this country. We would not have such a shortage of housing, such a shortage of public buildings, or such a shortage of schools, if it were not for the monumental increase in the interest rate which has occurred in the past 6 or 7 years.

How much has it gone up?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I suspect, if the Senator will look into the situation with respect to the 5¼ percent interest rate, that on a 25 or 30-year mortgage the owner will wind up paying more for the interest than for the house itself.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Yes; that often happens. Furthermore the house usually has one room less in it. It therefore becomes necessary to crowd the children into fewer rooms. That is one factor that has been overlooked, Mr. President. We talk about the increment that goes to the moneylenders. How about looking into what it is costing the people? It is costing the people a great deal more. It results in cheaper houses, in inadequate houses, in a smaller number of rooms in a home, in an inadequate number of school rooms, in smaller libraries, in smaller fire stations, in smaller public buildings of all types. The buyer not only pays more, he gets less. The size of his house is reduced; its space taken up by bigger interest rates.. For every one-half percent increase in interest rates, there are fewer square feet in the home, cheaper and fewer home appliances, and fewer cubic feet of breathing space for the family.

Our gross national product in 1957 was $440 billion. Our total debt in this country, public and private, has been estimated at three-quarters of a trillion dollars, or $750 billion. Of that $750 billion, at the end of 1958, $56 billion was represented by State and local indebtedness. In other words State and local government indebtedness is up to $56 billion. The U.S. Government indebtedness is about $280 billion. The private indebtedness is about $415 billion. Altogether the combined public and private debt of this country is about $750 billion.

When we raise the interest rate even by one-half of 1 percent on Government guaranteed loans, we might as well recognize that the interest rate will go up by at least 1 percent on loans that are not guaranteed by the U.S. Government.

What will it cost? What will be the result so far as the cost of an interest rate increase on the $750 billion public and private debt in this county is concerned? At 1 percent, it will cost $7½ billion per year in increased interest rates. At 2 percent increase the additional interest rate cost is $15 billion per year on our total debt.

Mr. President, we might well ask what has been happening in the last 6 years. During the last 6 years the interest rates on high-grade municipal bonds, of the bigger cities, that is, have gone up. I take my information from Standard and Poor's Index of Municipal Bonds. These are high-grade municipal bonds. These are not the bonds of the smaller cities, or smaller school districts. These are the high-grade municipal bonds. These are the gilt-edge bonds. They have gone up from 2 percent to 3.84 percent. That is what has happened in about 6½ years. That is nearly double, Mr. President. The smaller cities and towns and the little school districts are the ones that are paying through the nose at much higher rates. I am talking about the gilt-edge municipal securities now, when I say their interest rate has gone up from 2 percent to 3.84 percent in the last 6 years.

In the field of U.S. Government bonds, from which the income is taxable, in 1954 the average interest rate was 2.53 percent. Now it is 3.80 percent, which is an increase of nearly 1½ percent, in less than 5 years. That interest rate on U.S. Government bonds has been going up fast. Of course the private debt interest rate has gone up even faster.

We have heard Senators across the aisle argue that we have a budget to consider, and that we must balance the budget. One would think, to hear that kind of talk, that it was a golden calf that was being raised up. The Republican budget has about as much governmental sanctity as the golden calf had of religious validity. What will happen to the budget in this spiral of interest rates?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Texas has expired.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my time by 1½ minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is recognized.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. The Secretary of the Treasury, according to press reports, must refinance about $80 billion of our $280 billion public debt this year. An authorized increase in interest rates in this bill is an invitation to the moneylenders to hold the Treasury's feet to the fire. "The Government has already guaranteed a half percent more," they will say, "and we can get a half percent on the bonds." If the rate goes up, on $80 billion, a half of 1 percent is $400 million a year. In 10 years it is $4 billion more in interest that would have to be paid out of the taxpayers' pockets at prevailing rates.

That is of great concern to the American people. It has been said that those protecting the veterans want to raise these rates. I have the honor—and I am proud of it—and am grateful to this Senate for that honor to serve now as chairman of the Veterans' Subcommittee of the Senate. I say that an increase in interest rates on their homes is not what will protect the veterans of the United States. We will not protect them by kiting up the interest rate. If we want to protect the veterans, this is not the way to do it. Incidentally, the provisions for the veterans is only a small part of the bill. This is a National Housing Act. It provides for veterans' housing and for college dormitory housing and for public housing, and for virtually all kinds of housing. Kiting the interest rate will cripple the colleges by raising the cost of building their dormitories, and raising the rent they charge students, with the result that they will not be able to handle the population explosion which took place after World War II. Colleges will not be able to handle the students who will be crowding them. The result will be that there will be fewer dormitory rooms and classrooms in the colleges for college students to go into.

We have heard the talk from the other side of the aisle that we should let the interest rate work up and down. This bill would work it up, not down. There is no play up and down in it. It is all up, no down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The extended time of the Senator has again expired.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I am going to carry out my pledge and obligation to the American people and vote to keep interest rates down.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I have listened to all the debate on this question. I have listened to it with a great deal of interest and a great deal of agreement. I believe that the membership of the Committee on Banking and Currency voted unanimously in favor of the interest increase.

Certainly, no member of the committee on our side of the aisle wanted to increase the rate. We have fought against it year after year. It was last year that we finally agreed to a rise in the interest rate from 4½ percent to 4¾ percent, and tied it to the going FHA rate on section 203(b) mortgages, with one-half of 1 percent in between. We wrote that provision into law; that the VA interest rate should never be higher than a half percent below such FHA rate.

It became apparent, however, watching the VA starts and applications and appraisal requests which came in, that the program had simply become stymied. All the testimony before us dealing with the subject was to the effect that the only way we could get the VA program going was to loosen the interest rate.

We did not set the rate at 5¼ percent. We set the ceiling at 5¼ percent. It may very well be that the interest rate will go to 5¼ percent. I do not know. That is up to the Administrator of the Veterans' Administration. I realize that the interest rates were much lower back during the Roosevelt administration and during the Truman administration. I wish we still had low interest rates. However, as a matter of reality, we do not have them. Back in Roosevelt and Truman administrations we had bond purchases by the Federal Reserve Board, which stabilized the market. That practice was terminated even before the Truman administration went out of office. We have not had that operation since that time. Interest rates, whether we like it or not, have gone up.

I have not liked the increases any better than any other Senators. I have taken my place on the Senate floor and have spoken against these increases. I made one of the first speeches, back in the early part of 1953, against rising interest rates, and I pointed out then what the effect would be.

However, we are not living in the Roosevelt administration. We are not living in the Truman administration. We are living in the Eisenhower administration, and interest rates are higher. The question is do we want housing? I realize that if we pump money into the Federal National Mortgage Association, we can buy mortgages, and in that way we can get money. However, we had a great fight yesterday on direct home loans to veterans living in rural areas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am glad to yield to the distinguished chairman of the committee.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Would not the proposal here discussed and offered by the Senator from Oklahoma be equivalent to the direct loan program which yesterday we voted to cut in half by almost a unanimous vote?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is the same thing.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It has the same effect.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senate by a large majority—I do not recall exactly what the vote was—voted against it. Would not the adoption of the pending amendment be inconsistent with the action of yesterday?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It would be.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I agree completely on what is involved. All of us, of course, deplore the fact that interest rates have gone up. We deplore inflation. The price of automobiles has gone up, as has the price of everything, and so has the interest rate. To pick out one item and think we can correct it by this means is wholly a false way to approach the matter.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator is absolutely correct. By the way, in keeping with the suggestion he made about this being a direct loan program, the Gore amendment is now a part of the Monroney amendment. This is what it does. First of all, in order to operate, the amendment will require $165 million to be put up by the Treasury, and that is an expenditure. In other words, the added impact on the budget immediately is $165 million. When that is done, the Federal National Mortgage Association can turn around and reactivate its program to the extent of approximately $2 billion, with which to buy mortgages at par.

I should like to follow that thinking a little further. In 1954, Congress changed the Federal National Mortgage Association from the kind of organization the Senator from Tennessee has described to what was planned eventually to be a private corporation, and to use its services just like farm credit operations and Home Loan Bank Board operations and many other operations of that kind.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. There is the Production Credit Association.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; the Production Credit Association; and also the Farm Credit Administration. Since that time, $37 million worth of stock has been bought by private individuals. There are 37,000 shares held by 4,064 stockholders.

Do Senators realize what they are doing now? We will be wiping out these stockholders completely. We will be taking away $37 million which has been subscribed by private stockholders, and we will wipe the stockholders out of existence. We will be wiping out a private corporation and turning it into a Government operation, which not only is required to buy mortgages at par, but also cannot even make a service charge for its operation. So again Congress will have to appropriate money in order to operate the association.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. In order to be fair about it, if the Monroney amendment should be agreed to, it ought also to appropriate money to reimburse the owners of the $37 million worth of stock which those persons, in reliance upon the law, bought in this corporation, should it not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is the only right, fair thing to do.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Otherwise, the Government would be taking money without due process of law.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; we would be taking it away without due process of law.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Did I correctly understand the Senator to state that all the Democratic members of the committee agreed to this proposal?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Democratic and Republican members alike.

Mr. MANSFIELD. All the members of the committee?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The vote was unanimous. Some of us did not want to do it, but we simply said—and the Senator from Pennsylvania will remember this—that it was the only way in which we would get housing.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I think I shared the reluctance of the Senator from Alabama in voting as I did. But it seemed to me perfectly clear that the only alternative was to pump a lot of money into FNMA. That would have caused all the penny-pinching budget balancers to raise their voices all over again and would have enabled them to clamor about how we wild-eyed spenders wanted an unbalanced budget.

We were carrying a heavy enough load with the bill as reported by the committee, so with reluctance the Senator from Alabama and I felt that we were not prepared to pour a lot of money into FNMA because we did not want to kill the housing program.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator from Pennsylvania is exactly correct. We were trying to report a bill which would become law, in the first place, and would produce housing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am against high interest rates as much as is any other Member of this body. I am ready and willing to agree to do everything within the power of Congress to make available to the Government money at as low an interest rate as it is possible to obtain.

I do not question the good faith or integrity or ability of any who may disagree with me, but I wish to commend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] for the sense of responsibility he has demonstrated to the Senate and the Nation. I commend his committee and every member of it, headed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], because I think the choice is this simple. We can have either speeches about houses, or we can have houses.

The Senator knows, and I know, that it is very popular to be against high interest rates. I am against them.

I do not wish to chastise or criticize anyone who may want to make a record. But the record I want to make and the record I want the Senate and Congress to make, is a responsible record of which we can be proud. We can be proud of it if we let the free enterprise system operate to build some houses.

I am willing to begin tomorrow morning to do everything within my power to use the credit of the U.S. Government to bring down the price of money; but I will not do it on this bill because such action will not provide any housing for veterans.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from Alabama for yielding to me.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I object at this time. The Senator from Alabama has the floor. I shall not object when the Senator from Alabama has completed his remarks.

Mr. JAVITS. I intended to fit my remarks in with what the Senator from Alabama has said.

Mr. LONG. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. JAVITS. I, too, voted in committee, and it was a different vote from the one I cast last year on the very same question. I should like to state the reason I did so in fairness to myself and the committee, especially the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], who worried about this problem as much as I did.

I felt that such action would be a discrimination against the veteran. We would be cutting out around him and preventing him from having access to the money market, to which he was entitled to have access. There simply is not enough money around for this purpose to supply him with the direct loan, which is all this amounts to, in order to give the veteran who wants it a real opportunity to get a home under the VA bill. The market under the VA bill had dried up. Yet if we put up more dollars, which was what was wanted in order to go forward, that money would be used up, and the source would dry up again.

I do not know whether this proposal will work. But we can give it a trial.

When we come to some broad-scale proposal on interest rates, even if it is 4½ percent, I will pledge my vote now against a raise; but in this particular detail we would be discriminating against a particular group of people. That, I think, is not fair.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think the Senator from New York is correct. I have the same doubt. I shall do all I can to help pull down interest rates, but not at the expense of veterans who are entitled to homes. That is what the adoption of this kind of program would do.

First, I am confident it would never be signed into law. I have no way of knowing that, but I believe that to be true.

We have heard a good deal about what is good for the veterans. The House Committee on Veterans' Affairs reported a bill which was passed yesterday by a vote of almost three to one, which provided for increased interest rates. The House opposed such a proposal repeatedly in the past. But it was up against the reality of the situation this time.

The two largest veterans organizations in the country, the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the American Legion, have both urged Congress to adopt flexible interest rates, which we have done. I do not think those organizations yield to anyone in their interest in the welfare of the veterans.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I can probably use up my 2 minutes now. I received a telegram, copies of which were undoubtedly sent to many Senators.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Is the Senator speaking on his own time?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

> The American Legion respectfully requests your support of legislation to raise the interest ceiling on GI loans to 5¼ percent.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars have concurred in that request. The Veterans of Foreign Wars, through their legislative committee, speaks for a million veterans. I believe the American Legion speaks for 2 million veterans.

So with all respect to our very genial friends who have been talking about the moneychangers in the temple, who should be chastised with whips and scorpions, Wall Street bloated bankers, and everything else, here are the moneychanges in the Veterans of Foreign Wars and in the American Legion who respectfully importune Congress now to raise the interest rate.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I appreciate the comments of the Senator from Illinois.

I conclude with this statement. I think it represents the feeling of every Senator on the committee. It was distasteful to us, but we felt it was necessary to act as we did if we were to provide housing. That is what we are trying to do. We are trying to produce housing for American families. We are not disturbing the FHA rate or the general rate. We are changing some of the rental property rates, where that was necessary, in order to get the programs off the ground, without seeking to change it in the veterans' program. We are making it more or less uniform throughout the entire housing program for one purpose, and one purpose only, namely, to produce decent homes for American families.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in the absence of any other Senator who might yield time, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words before the vote. I have listened very carefully all evening to what appears to be a very well organized attack upon this administration, on the basis that it is responsible for high interest rates, and that high interest rates are a policy of the Eisenhower administration.

I have repeatedly denied that that was the case, not this year, but last year and the year before. I challenge anyone to read the RECORD of tonight and get from that RECORD any evidence or any proof of any kind that this administration has a high interest rate policy, or that it is responsible for higher interest rates than prevailed before the Eisenhower administration came into power 6 years ago. I say there has not been one item of proof placed in the RECORD that the responsibility for the high interest rates, as they are called, can be traced to the policies of the Eisenhower administration.

It has been stated in the debate that the Federal Reserve Board has some authority in the matter of credit; that it is able to influence credit through monetary controls which it has. I challenge the opposition to introduce a bill which will curb the power of the Federal Reserve Board. I challenged them last year to do this. The challenge was ignored. If they wish to come to grips with the question of interest rates, and if they are sincere in their attacks in respect of this matter, they should come to grips with the problem where it can be gripped, namely, in the powers of the Federal Reserve Board. They know it, but I do not believe they will dare come before Congress with proposed legislation which will curb the powers of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, they know it; and I do not believe they will dare propose legislation which would curb the powers of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I will not yield; I have only a few moments in which to speak. I have listened to the debate for a long time, and I do not intend to yield at present.

It has been said—and correctly—that the Federal Reserve Board is a creature of the Congress, not a creature of the executive branch of the Government. The Federal Reserve Board reports to the Congress; and the Congress is the place in which they should come to grips with the situation, if they really mean what they say about high interest rates.

Mr. President, I am very tired of hearing interest rates made a political football; but I have been hearing it for the past few years. If they really mean what they have said, if they really mean to come to grips with it, let them vote to proceed in a way by which that can be done.

Mr. President, I am grateful to the Senator from Alabama for the statement he made a moment ago. I am in support of that statement. I stand with him in opposition to the amendment; and I hope the Senate will vote to reject the amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, has all available time been used?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana has reserved 5 minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will state it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Has the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee been merged with the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma, so that they now constitute only one amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Those two amendments do not now stand separately before us, do they?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They do not.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I withdraw my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma will state it.

Mr. MONRONEY. Can the two amendments, which now have been merged into one, be stated at this time, for the information of the Senate? My amendment freezes the interest rates on GI housing and Capehart housing mortgages. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] provides for Federal National Mortgage Association support, at par, for mortgages issued in the future. I think both amendments should now be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the Monroney amendment as modified by the Gore amendment.

The Senator from Oklahoma has asked that the amendment, as modified, be read.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, inasmuch as the reading of the amendment would be purely technical, I withdraw my request that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well.

The question is on agreeing to the modified amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the committee amendment. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK (when his name was called). On this vote, I have a pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE], who is unavoidably absent. If the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE] were present and voting, he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote, I vote "nay." Accordingly, I withhold my vote.

The rollcall was resumed and concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senators from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] would vote "yea."

On this vote, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER]. If present and voting, the Senator from New Mexico would vote "yea," and the Senator from Louisiana would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY]. If present and voting, the Senator from New Mexico would vote "nay," and the Senator from Minnesota would vote "yea."

On this vote, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is paired with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER]. If present and voting, the Senator from Oregon would vote "yea," and the Senator from Arizona would vote "nay."

Mr. DIRKSEN. I announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] are detained on official business.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER]. If present and voting, the Senator from Arizona would vote "nay," and the Senator from Oregon would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 58, as follows:

NOT VOTING—13

So Mr. MONRONEY's modified amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the modified Monroney amendment to the committee amendment was rejected be reconsidered.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I should like to address a question to the chairman of the housing subcommittee. The information I have——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield the Senator from Oklahoma 2 minutes on the bill.

Mr. MONRONEY. I have information that contractors are doing work on $1,139 million worth of projects for Capehart housing for the military. This work is under construction loan, and will not be put under final insured mortgage until the buildings are completed and insured mortgages can be issued.

Of those contracts, $660 million are privately financed. Unless some retroactivity is provided on projects on which final insurance has not been issued, those contractors face bankruptcy because they must discount 4¼ percent mortgages to sell them in competition with mortgages with higher rates.

I should like to know what the position of the chairman of the subcommittee is, since authorization has been given for increasing Capehart housing loans from 4¼ to 5 percent. Will there be retroactivity to see that the contractors now building the projects can finance their loans, when final mortgages are issued, at the going rate?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That subject is covered on page 6 of the report. Of course, we have no way of knowing whether the interest rate will be increased, and if so, to what extent; but in the report the Commissioner is given responsibility for working out an arrangement.

Mr. MONRONEY. Is the authority given to the Commissioner to prevent contractors who are engaged in $660 million worth of work from going bankrupt?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I suggest that the Senator read the second paragraph, commencing on page 6 of the report, in which it is stated that it is the responsibility of the FHA Commissioner to make certain that all who may be affected by a change in interest rates are fairly treated.

Mr. MONRONEY. Perhaps that would mean those contractors could obtain financing, not at 4¼ percent, but at the higher level if so set by the Commissioner.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not want to say anything at this time with reference to the details of how those arrangements will be worked out, because I am frank to say I do not know. We must remember that, as conditions are today, even though there is in effect a 4¼ percent rate, actually there are discounts which amount to 4 or 5 points. That in effect means——

Mr. MONRONEY. The distinguished Senator knows that 2 months after the rates for Capehart housing had been increased, there was notice that the new interest rates would be effective. There was insurance against bankruptcy by reason of a statement that there will be 95 instead of 100 percent sales of those mortgages when completed.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that before the bill comes out of conference, between the two committees we shall do our best to get from the FHA Commissioner an outline of the plan he intends to put into effect. We shall do our best to see it is fair and equitable.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield some time to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator.

First, I thank this body for the courteous attention it gave to the Senator from Tennessee. Second, I should like to address a question to the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee.

Information has come to me that a number of lenders have incorporated in their instruments of mortgage a provision conditioned upon the future action of Congress; namely, that if the Congress should increase the interest rate in the future, the mortgages thus signed would carry into the future and require a higher interest rate. I have received calls from my own State, and information with respect to other States.

I should like to inquire if the bill contains any provision which would validate or invalidate such an undertaking.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I know of no particular case, but I understand that there are some pending contracts which carry that provision. However, not a single executed contract carries such a provision.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I understand there are some technical amendments which the chairman of the subcommittee wishes to offer and which are acceptable to the minority. I ask that they be called up.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have read.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, may I have an additional one-half minute?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield one-half minute to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. What would be the intention of the chairman of the subcommittee if such an undertaking had been entered into and such a loan had been approved?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am not certain that the FHA Commissioner would have approved such a contract; but if such a contract had been entered into and had been approved, Congress could do nothing about it. Congress could not upset a contract. However, I am of the opinion—and I say to the Senator that we shall certainly check on this—that the FHA Commissioner would not have approved a contract with such a provision in it. I shall check on it.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator check it before the bill goes to conference?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. I said we shall check on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] to the committee amendment will be stated by the clerk.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 99, in line 18, in the committee amendment after the word "homes", to insert a colon and "Provided, That in a case where certification of need has been denied by such State agency, the Commissioner may, upon application of the mortgagor, take such action as he deems appropriate."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 140, line 10, in the committee amendment, after the word "than", it is proposed to strike out "three" and insert "five."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 70, line 21, in the committee amendment, it is proposed to strike out "$88,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$8,000."

On page 99, line 9, it is proposed to strike out "The" and insert in lieu thereof "In carrying out the provisions of this section with respect to the insurance of mortgages on properties or projects designed for use as nursing homes, the."

On page 99, line 18, after "No" it is proposed to insert "such".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 118, line 21, in the committee amendment after the word "persons", it is proposed to strike out the comma and "and, where a local public housing agency has determined that the acquisition and repair, rehabilitation or remodeling of existing dwellings by the local public agency for use as a low-rent housing project is in the public interest of the community, to provide that the powers, functions, and duties vested by law in the Public Housing Commissioner and the Housing and Home Finance Administrator shall be employed in such manner as will encourage and facilitate the undertaking and carrying out of such project by such local public housing agency."

On page 123, line 3, it is proposed to strike out Sec. 404, as follows:

SEC. 404. Section 7 of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) Where a local public housing agency has determined and certified to the Public Housing Commissioner and to the Housing and Home Finance Administrator that the acquisition and repair, rehabilitation or remodeling of existing dwellings by the local public agency for use as low-rent housing the Commissioner and the Administrator shall employ the powers, functions, and duties vested in them by this or any other Act in such manner as shall facilitate and encourage the undertaking and carrying out of such a low-rent housing project by such local public housing agency, and the annual report referred to in subsection (b) of this section shall include information on the number of such cases and the manner in which such functions, powers and duties were so employed and exercised in such cases."

It is proposed to correct section numbers thereafter.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask the distinguished Senator from Alabama whether the amendment in effect would strike out section 404 of the bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to address the Senate for 2 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, section 404, which the amendment seeks to strike out, has to do with the acquisition of existing housing for public housing projects. That section, I have been told by my good friend from Alabama, was inadvertently left in the bill when it was before the committee. I am informed that had the Senator known the section was in the bill he would have moved to strike it out in the committee, and I suspect he would have had the necessary votes to do so. I therefore do not intend at this late date to take advantage of my good friend by objecting to the deletion of an extremely salutary provision. My reason for not doing so, in addition to my feeling of warm affection for the Senator from Alabama, is that in my opinion under existing law presently existing housing can be acquired for public-housing sites. In that connection I invite the attention of the Senate to section 9 of the Housing Act of 1937, which reads in part as follows:

The Authority may make loans to public-housing agencies to assist the development, acquisition, or administration of low-rent-housing or slum-clearance projects by such agencies.

Section 2, subsection (5) of the Housing Act of 1937 provides in part that—

The term "development" means any or all undertakings necessary for planning, financing (including payment of carrying charges), land acquisition, demolition, construction, or equipment, in connection with a low-rent-housing or slum-clearance project—

And includes in the definition of "construction activity" the "reconstruction, remodeling, or repair of existing buildings." Since this provision is clear in existing law, I have no objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama to delete the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr President I offer an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 70, line 20, in the committee amendment, it is proposed to insert "(1)" immediately following "(c)."

On Page 70, between lines 21 and 22, it is proposed to insert the following:

(2) Section 203(b)(5) of such Act is amended by inserting before the period a colon and the following: "Provided, That no service charge shall be allowed in the case of any mortgage which is insured under this Act after the date of enactment of the Housing Act of 1959."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HART. Mr. President——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan has an amendment to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it a technical amendment?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is not, but it is an amendment we have agreed to take to conference.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I offer an amendment for myself and the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA] identified as 2–4–59—D.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 320(a) of the committee amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 320. (a) Section 701 of the Housing Act of 1954 is amended by striking out the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "To facilitate urban planning for smaller communities lacking adequate planning resources, the Administrator is authorized to make planning grants to State planning agencies, or in the absence of any such planning agency in any State to an agency or instrumentality of government designated by the Governor of the State and acceptable to the Administrator as capable of carrying out the intent of this section, for the provision of planning assistance (including surveys, land use studies, urban renewal plans, technical services, and other planning work, but excluding plans for specific public works) to (1) cities, other municipalities, and counties having a population of less than fifty thousand according to the latest decennial census, and (2) any group of adjacent communities, either incorporated or unincorporated, having a total population of less than fifty thousand according to the latest decennial census and having common or related urban planning problems resulting from rapid urbanization."

Mr. HART. Mr. President, the amendment is designed to take care of the smaller cities, cities of 50,000 or less, in the States which at the present time do not have State planning agencies, in order that they may participate in urban planning funds. The amendment would authorize the Governor of a State to designate an existing State agency, provided that State agency is acceptable to the Administrator of the Federal fund.

There is no money complication, nor are there any interest rates involved, I will explain for the benefit of the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, the record on Senate bill 57 is complete and it is very clear.

At this point, the bill is not in many respects satisfactory to me. Neither does it jibe with the recommendations which I have spread on the record.

But, much as I disagree with some of the provisions, I am happy that the bill has been somewhat improved through discussions in the Committee on Banking and Currency and on the Senate floor.

There are many good things in the bill. There are some features with which I simply cannot agree because I am one who believes that a major obligation of every Member of this body to the American people is to make every practical move within his power to maintain a balanced budget without hampering any of the really vital functions of the Government.

One of these functions, of course, is our housing program.

Frankly, I am not happy with the bill as it now stands. I am, on the other hand, convinced that when the House of Representatives has completed its action and the respective bills of the two Houses are considered in conference, the budget-balancing philosophy of this administration and of the American people will have prevailed.

For this reason, Mr. President, I am going to vote for Senate bill 57. In doing so, I wish the RECORD to show that I reserve the definite right to vote against the housing bill in its final form if it does not follow a sound fiscal policy and still assure the continuation of a housing program to meet the needs of the American people. That kind of bill is possible, as I have pointed out to Senators throughout this debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, have all the technical amendments been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

The committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I did not understand whether the Senate took action on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan was agreed to.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill. There is a limitation of debate of 15 minutes on each side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. First, Mr. President, I announce to my colleagues on this side of the aisle that the meeting contemplated for 9:30 tomorrow morning will be held at 10:30 instead, because the hour is pretty late.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I am glad that the discussion of the bill went forward in the utmost of good spirit. It was a spirited debate at times, but there was gracious forbearance on both sides of the aisle.

I reassert the premise I stated on the first day of the discussion. I intend to vote against the bill. I believe that an administration which maintains a housing agency with nearly 11,000 people and gathers all the experience, background, and wisdom of that group to prepare a balanced, integrated bill, should have the measure adopted, and that the measure should not be departed from unless everything is pretty carefully considered. I think the administration bill was a good one. It failed in the vote on the substitute, and so I cannot accept the present bill.

It has been contended that we will make only a little hole in the budget dike, but one little hole will beget another. So it becomes an open invitation, once it is done, to exceed the budget estimates in other respects, and I do not care to go down that road.

I think the bill is adequate. Points have been made on the floor from time to time that it is an inadequate measure for the problems and the challenges which are presently before us. As I think about it, I think about the old cowpoke who went into Nieman Marcus' store in Dallas, Tex. He looked around at all the fancy gadgetry. When the saleslady came up, she said, "Is there something I can show you?" He was rather shy and timid, but he said, "Lady, I ain't never seen so many things that I could do without."

I think the time has come for this country to do without a few things in the interest of a balanced budget, in order to keep these inflationary fevers dampened down. For that reason, I intend to vote against the bill. That is all I have to say, Mr. President.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote! Vote!

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time on condition that the minority do likewise.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, our time is yielded back.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded from both sides.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote! Vote!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senators from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senators from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] would each vote "yea."

Mr. DIRKSEN. I announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 60, nays 28, as follows:

NOT VOTING—10

Anderson	Kuchel	O'Mahoney
Beall	Murray	Wiley
Chavez	Muskie
Ellender	Neuberger

So the bill (S. 57) was passed.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized and directed to make all necessary clerical and technical changes, including changes in section numbers and cross-references in the engrossed bill (S. 57) to extend and amend laws relating to the provision and improvement of housing and the renewal of urban communities, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill, as passed by the Senate, be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FEDERAL AIRPORT ACT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 46, Senate bill 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The bill (S. 1), to amend the Federal Airport Act in order to extend the time for making grants under the provisions of such act, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

HOUSE BILL ORDERED TO LIE ON THE TABLE

The bill (H.R. 2256) to amend chapter 37 of title 38, United States Code, to provide additional funds for direct loans; to remove certain requirements with respect to the rate of interest on guaranteed loans; and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and ordered to lie on the table.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourns today, it adjourn until 11 o'clock tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wish to express my gratitude to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and the other members of the committee who worked so diligently and so long and so effectively to pass an effective housing bill in the Senate. I realize that many doubts had to be resolved. I realize that judgments did not always agree. However, as the result of many hours put in by this very able committee, we have tonight, by a more than 2 to 1 vote, passed a bill in the Senate which does not dot every "i" or cross every "t" or completely embrace each word of the President's plans as submitted by the Housing Commissioner.

However, if the administration's estimate is correct and if its prophesies are true, and if its statements are accurate, the budget for the next fiscal year will come within $35 million, under the administration's bill, of what this bill provides.

The bill must go to conference. I do not know what will come out of conference. I know some people would like to have everything their own way. I am one of them. However, legislation is a matter of give and take. We have made some concessions. We have adjusted our views. I am hopeful that in conference the House and Senate can reason together and come out with a bill which will be good for the country. I hope it it will be satisfactory to the administration.

It does not take much reasoning, it does not take much time, it does not take much effort to be against something. It takes a great deal of time and a great deal of effort and a great deal of work to produce something constructive. Whether we will be able to do that and get agreement with the Executive, no one knows.

However, we have done our best in the Senate, and the vote just cast in behalf of the bill shows that a substantial majority of the Members of the Senate believe it is the best bill that could be obtained. I believe that if the other body and the coequal branch of government spend as much time in attempting to meet our views as we have spent trying to meet theirs, we will ultimately have a bill which will benefit the Nation and which will build us some much needed housing.

I thank the Senators for their efforts, and express the hope that we may be able to conclude action on the airport bill tomorrow and then go over until next week. If we complete action on the airport bill tomorrow, we will take up some resolutions on the calendar which I anticipate will be noncontroversial. Then we will go over until next week. Then we do not expect to have any rollcalls before Monday, week. We will do our best to protect each Member in that regard. I wish to call attention to the fact that we will have a joint session on Lincoln's Birthday, so that all Senators may be on record.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from Texas about the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN]. This is probably the last bill that will come out of the Committee on Banking and Currency while I am chairman of it. I wish again to express my appreciation for the fine job the Senator from Alabama has done in holding hearings on the bill and in guiding it through the Senate. There is no man in the Senate who knows as much about housing as does the Senator from Alabama. I agree with the Senator from Texas, the majority leader, in his remarks about the character of the bill. I think it is a good bill. I think the Senate is to be congratulated on it.

I also wish to express my appreciation to the majority leader for his assistance in getting the bill under way and in obtaining the cooperation of all the members of the committee and the Members of the Senate.

I think he has done excellent work and constructive work in having a bill passed so early in the session to meet the very dire needs which have arisen in various fields of housing.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, first, I thank the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Arkansas for the very kind remarks they have made. It is most unusual to have a bill of this importance passed so early, not only in a new session, but in a new Congress. I cannot help feeling that every Senator is pleased that we have passed the bill so early. I am confident that had we waited until April or May, as has been the case in the past, we could not have passed a better bill than this.

I am confident that the bill will produce housing. I say to the majority leader, in keeping with what he said, that a careful examination of the bill will reveal that practically everything the administration asked for is in the bill. It may not be exactly as the administration asked for it in every case, but in substance what was asked for is in the bill.

The bill represents much more than most persons realize. It represents the cooperative effort of the legislative branch, so far as the Senate is concerned, and of the Housing and Home Finance Agency and its component bodies. It is a good measure. It will produce housing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I appreciate what the Senator from Alabama has said. I repeat: I am proud of the Senate; I am proud of the substantial majority of the Senate which was willing to go as far as it did in an attempt to meet the Executive more than halfway. I express the hope that he may be as considerate of our viewpoint as we have been of his.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I can compliment the distinguished Senator from Alabama. I know the complexities of the bill. I served on the Committee on Banking and Currency years ago. So I salute him for a job well done.

I do not quite share the optimism of the majority leader. As an example, by a voice vote, the Senate adopted an amendment submitted by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]. In going back and examining the text of the amendment, I discovered that an extra $150 million was made available if there were bona fide applications for so-called urban renewal. In the text of the bill itself as it came to the Senate there was at least some brake upon that item, because the bill required the determination of the Administrator and the approval of the President.

I think those safeguards were taken out of the language, if I have read the amendment correctly; so the only determinant for the $150 million is whether or not bona fide applications are pending. If that becomes the criterion—and the word "may" was stricken, and the word "shall" was introduced—and if it became necessary to do so, the bill will be very substantially out of line with the budget estimates.

I am not insensible of the complexities which are involved in this matter; but this action reinforces the statement I made earlier in the day that we are trifling with a contemplated budget balance. That is one road on which I do not want to venture, in view of the delicate situation which confronts the country at this time.

FARM FOLLY

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, Secretary of Agriculture Benson recently quoted some alarming figures on farm surpluses. He pointed out that by next July we will have more than $9 billion of surplus farm commodities in Government inventory and under loan. The cost of storage and interest on these Government stocks will be a fantastic $1 billion a year.

This certainly dramatizes the need to abandon outdated and ineffective price support and acreage control programs. Continuing these programs would only perpetuate the double taxation of the American consumer. The consumer pays in taxes for the purchase and storage of these commodities and then he pays again in the excessively high prices for these commodities in grocery stores and supermarkets.

These antiquated programs might be defensible if they were truly of assistance to farmers—all farmers. But farmers in my own State of Pennsylvania, for instance, find that rigid supports serve only to drive up the price of grain and feed for their cattle and poultry.

The program which this administration has consistently recommended has never been given a real chance to prove itself. It is for this reason that such emergency programs as the Soil Bank and special surplus disposal operations have been instituted.

It is my earnest hope that we can produce a body of agricultural legislation at this session which will eliminate the shackles on the farmer's efficiency and help him to help himself.

Mr. President, the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette on February 2, 1959, published an excellent, hard-hitting editorial entitled "Farm Folly." I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARM FOLLY

Uncle Sam will spend nearly $5½ billion in the year which ends next June 30 on programs to stabilize farm prices and farm income. That's a record high.

Uncle Sam will have by that date more than $9 billion tied up in surplus crops. That's a record high.

Uncle Sam will soon be spending more than $1 billion a year just to store and handle his crop surpluses. That's a record high.

Uncle Sam's farm policies have failed, are failing, and will, in the absence of drastic changes, continue to fail in serving the interests of Americans generally.

Present systems of Government price supports, being little related to the real market, encourage farmers to overproduce certain basic crops, like wheat and cotton. At the same time, modern technology makes it ever easier for farmers to produce more abundantly: almost 50 years ago, a man put in 106 hours of work to produce 100 bushels of wheat; today he puts in only 22 hours.

The farm problem—the problem of assuring farmers a fair and stable income, but of doing so without higher and higher cost to all the taxpayers—has many complexities and calls for many related answers. But one of them—not the only one—must surely be to link more realistically than now the production of basic crops to the needs of the market. That has been an aim of the Eisenhower administration and particularly of its Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Benson.

That aim is implicit in much of the new proposals that the President and Mr. Benson have sent to Congress. They want, among other things, to scrap the present formula which in a way gears price supports to conditions of 1910–14. They want to gear price supports to average conditions over a period of 3 years prior to a current year, as has been recently adopted for corn. This would be accompanied by an end to such other controls as telling a farmer how many acres he can plant at most. If, however, Congress prefers to retain the old formula, then they ask that they be allowed to vary the level of supports to far lower, if need be, than the present floor of 75 percent of so-called parity.

There are mandatory price supports now for 12 of the 250 different kinds of U.S. farm products. Of that 12, 3—wheat, corn, and cotton—"account," in the President's words, "for about 85 percent of the Federal inventory of price-supported commodities though they only produce about 20 percent of the total cash farm income." Moreover, he points out, 90 percent of the Government outlays for price supports on wheat go to half the farms—the largest ones—that produce wheat.

If the general public were but one-tenth as interested in this topic as the larger wheat farmers, the President's new farm proposals would fare much better than they seem likely to in this Congress.

TRANSACTION OF ADDITIONAL ROUTINE BUSINESS

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. SALTONSTALL, from the Committee on Armed Services:

Herbert Frank York, of California, to be Director of Defense Research Engineering.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, as in executive session, from the Committee on Armed Services I report favorably approximately 15,105 nominations for temporary and permanent appointment and promotion in the Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force. Since these names have already appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to save the expense of printing on the Executive Calendar, I ask unanimous consent that they be ordered to lie on the Vice President's desk for the information of any Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The nominations ordered to lie on the desk are as follows:

Col. Archie Higdon, for appointment as permanent professor of the U.S. Air Force Academy;

James P. Henry, and sundry other persons, for appointment in the Regular Air Force;

George A. Bennett, and sundry other officers, for promotion in the Regular Air Force; and

Francis L. Churchville, and sundry other officers, for permanent appointment in the Marine Corps; and Henry W. Horst, and sundry other officers, for temporary appointment in the Marine Corps.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I also report favorably the nominations of 22 major generals and 20 brigadier generals in the Air Force and 8 major generals and 16 brigadier generals in the Army, as well as 820 Army nominations in the grade of lieutenant colonel and below. I also report the nominations of 34 rear admirals in the Navy and 1 brigadier general in the Marine Corps. Included on this list are the names of Rear Adm. Rawson Bennett to continue as Chief of Naval Research for 2 years and of Rear Adm. B. W. Hogan to continue as Chief of Bureau of Medicine and Surgery for 2 years. I ask that these nominations be printed on the Executive Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nominations will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

The nominations placed on the Executive Calendar are as follows:

Brig. Gen. Marshall Stubbs, U.S. Army, for appointment as Chief Chemical Officer, U.S. Army, as major general in the Regular Army of the United States and as major general in the Army of the United States;

Maj. Gen. John Frederick Bohlender, Army of the United States (brigadier general, Medical Corps, U.S. Army), and sundry other officers, for appointment in the Regular Army of the United States;

Maj. Gen. Kenneth B. Hobson (brigadier general, Regular Air Force), U.S. Air Force, and sundry other officers, for appointment in the Regular Air Force;

Rear Adm. Rawson Bennett II, U.S. Navy, to be Chief of Naval Research in the Department of the Navy for a term of 2 years with the rank of rear admiral;

Rear Adm. Bartholomew W. Hogan, Medical Corps, U.S. Navy, to be Chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery in the Department of the Navy; and Charles B. Martell, and sundry other officers of the Navy, for permanent promotion to the grade of rear admiral.

ADDITIONAL BILLS INTRODUCED

Additional bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

(See the remarks of Mr. BUTLER when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. DIRKSEN (for himself, Mr. KEATING, Mr. SALTONSTALL, and Mr. JAVITS):

S. 955. A bill to amend chapter 73 of title 18, United States Code, with respect to obstruction of court orders;

S. 956. A bill to amend chapter 49 of title 18, United States Code, to punish flight to avoid prosecution for unlawful destruction of educational or religious structures; and

S. 957. A bill to provide for the retention and preservation of Federal election records and to authorize the Attorney General to compel the production of such records; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 958. A bill to assist in meeting the costs of special professional services needed in carrying out public school desegregation programs, and for other purposes; and

S. 959. A bill to amend Public Laws 815 and 874, 81st Congress, to provide for the education of children of members of the Armed Forces in communities in which the public schools are closed; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

S. 960. A bill to amend the Civil Rights Act of 1957 to afford the Civil Rights Commission an additional 2 years within which to submit its final report, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See the remarks of Mr. DIRKSEN when he introduced the above bills, which appear under a separate heading.)

ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE TO AMERICAN INDIANS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, as you know, for years I and many of my colleagues have been fighting for the betterment of the Indian people. We have introduced much legislation, some of which has passed and on some of which Congress has not yet taken affirmative action. One bill in which I have been most interested is a bill, S. 809 of the 85th Congress, which was cosponsored by 20 Senators, but which did not get out of the Senate Interior Committee. This bill is designed to have the Congress appropriate $20 million for the purpose of making loans or grants to Indian tribes so that they may encourage industry to operate a plant on or near their Indian reservations so that it may create jobs for the Indian people, and enable them to be gainfully employed all the year round and earn sufficient pay to take care of their families with the dignity that the average American family does.

Mr. President, there has been brought to my attention an essay written by Miss Mary Ann Chaconas, a student at Western High School, Washington, D.C., which won a nationwide contest, and is being published by the National Essay Association of Los Angeles, Calif., in the Annual Anthology of High School Essays. This essay is as follows:

WHO IS THE SAVAGE?

Movies of the Old West picture Indians as savages. In these films they go on merciless raids and provoke bloody massacres. Very few tell the truth.
